Mr. MANN. I am familiar with the facts. He is now in the service, by the way.

Mr. BUTLER. He is acting assistant surgeon.

Mr. MANN. He went in and resigned and went out.

LLOYD C. STARK.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16424) for the relief of Lloyd C. Stark.

The bill and committee amendments were read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would reserve his objection.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the truth about this young man is this: He was in the Navy and stood very high in it. He did not want to resign from it, but his father was part owner and manager of the largest nursery in the world, and his father's health broke down, he had nervous prostration, and he died not very long ago. His business was very large and intricate, and the family insisted that this young man resign and come home to take charge of the work that naturally fell to his father, one of the three or four managers of this great nursery. The report of the committee shows that he was a very efficient naval officer and he is anxious to get back into the Navy. His father has died, and that part of the estate has been arranged for by others as managers. I understand—I am not dead sure I am right about it—that there is a shortage of naval officers.

Mr. BUTLER. There is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me that where a trained man, an experienced officer, wants to go back into the Navy, who is in the prime of life and in good health, that it would be the part of wisdom to permit him to go back. That is about all there is to it. The report of the committee gives his character and his military history.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think I can subscribe to every statement that the distinguished Speaker has made, both as to the facts and opinion. I am inclined to think there ought to be a way by which this and other good men could get back into the Navy. But what are the facts? No one can get back into the Navy under circumstances now unless he has political influence. I am not in favor of putting men into the Navy because of political influence which gets them there, and when a man goes into the Navy or the Army the first thing that he needs to learn is that that which is, is; that he can not change facts, and if he disobeys an order or a regulation he has to suffer the consequences.

This man did not disobey an order or a regulation, but he resigned. Now, it is proposed to put him back at an additional number in the rank to which he is credited, and whatever rank he goes into he will go as an additional number over the number now authorized by law. Of course, the committee proposes that in order to save what they think would be an injustice to those now in the Navy. It will increase, if the man should remain in the Navy long enough, the number of rear admirals, if he should be named as a rear admiral, and perhaps that ought to be done. Every man who is plucked now by the "plucking board," every man who resigns, every man who has had ill health and goes out and has had his health restored, or many of them, at least, see the retired pay at the end of the service. I doubt whether that is the case here or not, because I assume this young man is well off. But they want to go back in. Well, I think such things ought to be done under a general law. I am perfectly willing to let the President name anybody he pleases in the Army or the Navy as an officer, and let him be the judge. I am not willing to let Congress judge of individuals.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. McCOY. I want to say to the gentleman that the bill immediately preceding this one was introduced by me. I will say to him, so far as political influence is concerned, that what happened in that case was this: This young man himself went to the department, and I never saw the Secretary or anyone in the department for him at all.

Mr. MANN. I am not using the term "political influence" in any bad sense, the gentleman understands.

Mr. McCOY. I understand that; but in the sense that a man may be able to influence a Member of the House to go there. Now, I never saw anyone there, but the people in the department have written the letter which they did write to the committee, and I know from what I have heard from other sources they are very anxious to get him back in there.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey, that there is more politics in the Army or in the Navy, either one, than there is in Congress.

Mr. McCOY. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] tells me that the Surgeon General came and asked, on account of the need for surgeons in the Navy, that this young man, with his very excellent record, and now in the contract service and rendering efficient service, be restored, because they wanted him, and in a way not to hurt anybody else in the Navy.

Mr. MANN. Because they needed an additional man in the Navy they took one who is now in the Navy, and proposed to put him in the Navy, although he is now there.

Mr. McCOY. The gentleman is mistaken. He is in the Navy in one sense of the word, but he is simply under contract. He is not in the regular service.

Mr. MANN. He is doing nothing else but acting as assistant surgeon?

Mr. McCOY. What he is doing is this: Examining those who apply for enlistment.

Mr. MANN. And he is not in line for promotion.

Mr. McCOY. Not at all; he can not be promoted.

Mr. MANN. And can not go on the retired list; and if he remained in the service he could. He and other naval officers ought to find out that when they have resigned they have resigned, and when they have disobeyed orders they have disobeyed orders, and when they meet the enemy they meet the enemy, and when they meet a thing which is over and gone by they can not change it and stand in the same position as before.

Mr. McCOY. There is a difference between meeting the enemy and resigning. In meeting the enemy you may be killed; in resigning you have another chance.

Mr. MANN. Some of these days these gentlemen who will be killed will be haunting us and asking us to pass these bills to return them to life.

Mr. McCOY. I will vote for such a bill if the gentleman will introduce one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to publish a report of the committee as an extension of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the committee report referred to:

Report to accompany H. R. 16424.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16424) to authorize the President to reinstate Lloyd C. Stark to the active list of the United States Navy, having had same under consideration, report it to the House with the following amendments, with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass:

Amend by striking out, in line 6, all after the word "after," all of line 7, and the first three words in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "Charles Lewis Best, lieutenant, junior grade." Following that, insert the following:

"Provided, That the said Lloyd C. Stark shall establish to the Secretary of the Navy, by the usual examination prescribed by law for the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) in the United States Navy, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of said grade."

Insert in line 8, after the word "Provided," the word "further."

The fact that the Navy Department has very wisely ruled that promising young officers should not resign after the expenditure of many thousands of dollars by the Government for their training and education meets with the approval of this committee. If that course is wise, then it appears equally proper that young officers who have received this training should be welcomed back to the Navy, where their valuable training may be utilized to the greatest possible extent.

The committee finds upon careful investigation that extraordinary circumstances necessitated the resignation of Ensign Stark; that he very reluctantly resigned; that those compelling circumstances no longer exist and he now desires to return to the service for which he is trained and especially qualified; that he is actuated by purely patriotic motives, and that by returning to the service he gives up a business position which entails far greater remuneration than he will receive as a lieutenant in the Navy; that he has had an exceptionally varied naval experience for a young officer and a most excellent record, as reported by his various commanding officers.

Lloyd C. Stark completed his four years' course at the United States Naval Academy and graduated "with credit" in 1908. Prior to his graduation he developed exceptional skill with firearms and was selected as one of 12 men to represent the United States Naval Academy in the national rifle matches. The team, of which he was a member, made such a remarkably good record that Mr. Stark, together with the other members of the rifle team, received a letter of commendation from the President of the United States. Mr. Stark was later selected as one of the 12 most expert shots in the United States Navy to compete in the national rifle matches, in which matches the Navy team, of which he was a member, made a good record.

It appears that he was attached to the U. S. S. Montana shortly after that vessel went into commission, at which time Mr. Stark, because of his experience in marksmanship, was selected to fire the ship's guns on her calibration practice. That Mr. Spark performed this important duty in a most efficient manner is evidenced by the fact that the Montana shortly thereafter made the highest gunnery record of any ship in the Navy. The gunnery records show that at the time the U. S. S. Montana made the record Mr. Stark was the assistant battery officer of the starboard 6-inch battery. This battery made the highest record of any in the Navy. Upon the subsequent detachment of the lieutenant in charge of the battery Mr. Stark, at that time only a midshipman, was because of his recognized ability, placed in charge of this battery.

In examining the record of Mr. Stark the committee has made the following excerpts from the various official reports of his several commanding officers:

"(a) Mr. Stark is an excellent divisional officer, and since the detachment of officer in charge of 6-inch battery has, owing to this ability, been given charge of division.

"(b) I consider him a very promising young officer.

"(c) Very attentive to duty and a very promising young officer.

"(d) During this quarter this officer has been assigned to engine-room duties. In these duties he has so progressed in knowledge and usefulness that the senior engineer officer has reported him competent to take charge of an engine-room watch, which duty he has performed with entire satisfaction.

"(e) This officer shows a real interest in all of his duties. He has been officer of the deck, midshipman of the watch, assistant engineer, and has had electrical and navigational duties. In all he has constantly progressed in knowledge and usefulness."

In all these reports the committee finds that Mr. Stark was 75 times given the rating of "excellent," was 17 times rated "very good," and received no lower ratings than these. The various ratings used in the Navy are as follows: "'Excellent," "very good," "good," "tolerable," "indifferent," "bad," and "failure."

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, as the Speaker always sets a good example. I make a similar request in the case of my bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCoy] makes a similar request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the report referred to:

Report to accompany H. R. 7194.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7194) for the relief of Acting Asst. Surg. Elwin Carlton Taylor, United States Navy, having had the same under consideration, report it to the House with the following amendments, and as amended recommend that the bill do pass:

Lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, strike out the words "to take rank in the grade of passed assistant surgeons as an extra number next after the name of Winfield Scott Pugh, jr.," and in lieu thereof insert the following: "as an additional number, to rank next after the fifty-ninth officer in lineal standing on the list of passed assistant surgeons."

Line 10, after the word "act," change the period to a semicolon and add the following proviso:

"And provided further, That the said Elwin Carlton Taylor shall be required to satisfactorily pass the usual examinations required by law to determine his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of the grade to which he is to be appointed."

Dr. Taylor was appointed an assistant surgeon in the Navy October 12, 1903, and promoted to the grade of passed assistant surgeon October 12, 1906, and voluntarily resigned on March 12, 1908. Since June 27, 1912, he has been serving in the Navy as an acting assistant surgeon and is serving in that capacity at the present time, giving him a total naval service of about six years. The Navy Department reports that his record as an officer in the Navy has been excellent, and also reports upon the urgent need of more medical officers in the Navy, and in view of Dr. Taylor's special fitness for the service the department recommends favorable consideration of the bill as is set forth in the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, March 4, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In further reference to your letter inclosing a copy of the bill (H. R. 7194) for the relief of Acting Asst. Surg. Elwin Carlton Taylor, United States Navy, and requesting the views and recommendations of the department thereon, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

Elwin Carlton Taylor was born May 7, 1875, and is now approximately 38 years and 10 months of age. He was appointed an assistant surgeon in the Navy October 12, 1903; was promoted to passed assistant surgeon October 12, 1906; and resigned March 12, 1908. He entered the Navy again June 27, 1912, as an acting assistant surgeon and is serving in that capacity at the present time. His total naval service amounts to about six years and his record as an officer in the regular service and as an acting assistant surgeon is excellent.

It is desirable that the bill be amended in the following particulars: First, in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, strike out the words "to take rank in the grade of passed assistant surgeons as an extra number next after the name of Winfield Scott Pugh, jr.," and in lieu thereof substitute the words "as an additional number, to rank next after the fifty-ninth officer in lineal standing on the list of passed assistant surgeons"; and, second, after the word "act," line 10, change the period to a semicolon and add the words "And provided further, That the said Elwin Carlton Taylor shall be required to satisfactorily pass the usual examinations required by law to determine his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of the grade to which he is to be appointed." These amendments are deemed essential, for in addition to requiring Dr. Taylor to demonstrate his present fitness for a commission in the regular service, the first amendment recommended provides that he be placed on the list of passed assistant surgeons in exactly the same numerical or lineal position which he occupied on the date he resigned from the service, March 12, 1908.

Owing to the excellent record of Dr. Taylor while a member of the Medical Corps of the Navy, and in view of his special fitness for the service and of the urgent need of more medical officers in the Navy, the department recommends that the measure (H. R. 7194), amended as suggested above, be favorably considered.

Faithfully, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

THE CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

The committee has adopted the amendments recommended by the department in the above letter and as amended recommend that the bill do pass.

JOSEPH ELIOT AUSTIN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2642) authorizing the President to reinstate Joseph Eliot Austin as an ensign in the United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to reinstate former Midshipman Joseph Eliot Austin in the United States Navy with the rank of ensign.

SEC. 2. That he take position in the grade of ensign at the foot of the class which graduated from the United States Naval Academy in June, 1908.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, there is a mistake made as to the committee which made this report. It was made in the Naval Affairs Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reinstate former Midshipman Joseph Eliot Austin in the United States Navy with the rank of ensign, and, after one year's service as ensign, he shall be promoted to the grade of lieutenant, junior grade, to take rank with and next after Aquilla Gibbs Dibrell, lieutenant, junior grade: Provided, That the said Joseph Eliot Austin, after one year's service as ensign, shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, by examination pursuant to law, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention to this particular bill as briefly as possible, and say that this young man, Joseph Eliot Austin, graduated from the Naval Academy in June, 1908, and immediately thereafter was ordered on the U. S. S. South Dakota. It appears that about a year and a half after that time he married a young lady in the Philippine Islands. At that time the law provided that a midshipman could not marry within two years after his graduation. The law has subsequently been changed, and they can marry at any time after their graduation now.

It appeared from the hearings before our committee that there was an insert called insert No. 5, or regulation No. 5, in the ship's book of regulations providing that midshipmen could not marry within two years after their graduation. It appears that young Austin did not have, or could not find in the book of regulations held and owned by him, this insert No. 5. He and his friends looked through several other books of regulations on board, and they did not have this insert No. 5. The captain of the ship knew that the wedding was about to take place and did not tell the young man that he was getting married contrary to the Navy regulations, and the captain of the ship was invited to attend the wedding. The hearings show that he was sorry that he could not attend, but that he said he would allow other officers on board to attend the wedding.

Some time after the wedding the young man was informed that he had violated regulation No. 5, and he was requested to state his case to the commanding officer. He did not state his case to his commanding officer, assuming that he would be court-martialed and that he would then have an opportunity to tell just what transpired on board ship and show that everybody knew that he was going to get married, including his commanding officer; that there was no one on board the ship who knew that he was violating the regulations.

During the past two years the young man has been assistant instructor at the Culver Military Academy, in Indiana, and has also been in charge of the U. S. S. Yantic, in the Michigan Naval Militia, where he has done very good service and where his service on board the ship is very much of the same character as the service he would have been required to perform if he had remained in the Navy as a midshipman.

This bill provides that he be reinstated as an ensign at the bottom of the class at which he graduated in 1908.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this is rather a peculiar case from several standpoints. One is that the young man looked at the regulations, but page 5, which had reference to getting married, was missing. Then he was called upon to make a defense, and he did not make any because he thought he was going to be court-martialed. I think under the regulations of the Navy a case of dismissal goes to the Secretary of the Navy for his approval, and then goes finally to the President. In this case the young man was unable to find out, in the first place, whether he had the right to get married or not, and then the commanding officer of the vessel and his other superior officers seem to have known nothing about it, and he was told nothing about it. It is rather a strange kind of a case, coming up in this way.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that justice may be done to this young man, whom I do not know, but whom I pity.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know him, either.

Mr. BUTLER. In justice to him, let it be said that the officer of the ship approved his marriage and sent the executive officer to the wedding as best man. They misled this young fellow, and the men who did it ought to be punished.

Mr. FOSTER. That is substantially what I stated a moment ago.

Mr. BUTLER. Excuse me. The young man did not know this naval regulation.

Mr. FOSTER. I said that he did not.

Mr. BUTLER. He was absolutely ignorant of it, and it was the business of the superior officer of the ship to have told him that.

Mr. FOSTER. I said he did not, but at the same time, in the regulations that were there it seemed that the particular page he was looking for was gone, and when he could have made an explanation he did not do it, but was waiting for a court-martial.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will say to the gentleman that in cases of this kind, for violation of the regulations on board ship, a court-martial invariably follows, so that the officer or enlisted man has a chance to defend himself. This young man expected a court-martial. There is no question about that; but the court-martial never occurred. Since then that regulation, No. 5, or whatever the number is, has been repealed, and young men graduating from the academy are permitted to marry at any time thereafter. This young man has kept himself in touch with the service all the time since he has been out of the Navy. He is at present connected with the Naval Militia of Michigan and is rendering very good service. I have here a letter from his superior officer aboard the U. S. S. Yantic that I would be pleased to read to the gentleman, if he cares to hear it.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. This bill was given very careful consideration in the Sixty-second Congress, and voluminous testimony was taken, and it was favorably reported in that Congress. I reintroduced the bill in this Congress, and it again has been favorably reported.

In reference to the reason why this young officer did not find in the regulations the prohibition against marriage during his term as midshipman, I wish to state that he consulted his file of instructions and changes, and the officers of his mess also consulted their files, and they did not find sheet No. 5 of the instructions. Whose fault it was I do not know. This ship was away from Continental United States. It had been cruising in Pacific waters. The instructions would be sent, of course, from the authorities here in Washington, and possibly that sheet may have been omitted and was not distributed to these mess officers. This young man made an effort to find the law. He did not find the law, and when he went to his superior officer and invited him to attend the ceremony he was not advised of the existence of such a law, nor did any other superior officer on that vessel advise him of the existence of the law.

It seems to me that this young man used due diligence in ascertaining the law, and ought not to be held accountable under those circumstances. The commanding officer of this vessel, the South Dakota, was soon thereafter dismissed for the good of the service.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman state that again? I did not hear it.

Mr. ESCH. The commanding officer of this vessel was subsequently dismissed from the service.

The committee sought to get the testimony of the commanding officer and held this case open for four weeks seeking to find him in order to get his testimony, but were unsuccessful in finding him.

Mr. FOSTER. There seems to have been a sort of mystery about this case. Here was a young man who had graduated from the Naval Academy in 1908, and this occurred in 1909, a year after he graduated at Annapolis. It seems to me the young man ought to have known something about the regulations, but I realize that his commanding officer ought to have known and ought to have informed him if it was a violation of the regulations. It seems to me a strange thing that an officer of the Navy would not do so. I do not know anything about this commanding officer, what sort of a character he had, or anything about him.

Mr. BUTLER. We tried to find the commanding officer, but could not.

Mr. FOSTER. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who introduced this bill, I am going to withdraw my objection to it and let it be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

RATHBUN, BEACHY & CO.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 359.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 359, which is H. R. 2312, for the relief of Rathbun, Beachy & Co. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill and the committee amendment, which appear earlier in to-day's proceedings, were again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SARAH M'LAUGHLIN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10897) for the relief of Sarah McLaughlin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sarah McLaughlin, widow of John McLaughlin, deceased, who was instantly killed in February, 1912, by reason of a defective cable, while engaged in the employment of the United States Government, in the Reclamation Service, at the Pathfinder Dam, Wyoming, the sum of $5,000.

With the following committee amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, as I understand it this is a personal injury case where the Government has already paid to the claimant the amount allowed by the general law, to wit, one year's salary, and the claimant now seeks to recover an additional amount. I think the committee possibly computes it at one year's salary.

Mr. GOOD. The Government has already paid one year's salary. A large part of it, however, was paid, not to the widow, but for the funeral expenses of the deceased. The amount paid was $936.96. Of that amount $350 was necessary to pay the funeral expenses of the decedent and the railway fare to the former home of the family. The decedent was killed without any fault on his part at Pathfinder Dam, Wyo. He was engaged on a little platform that was constructed overhanging the canyon. A cable was attached directly above his head, and while a heavy load was being carried across the canyon the cable broke and struck Mr. McLaughlin and knocked him from the platform on which he was standing to the bottom of the canyon—160 feet below. He was instantly killed.

He left two children, one 2 years old and one 6 years old, as I recall. Immediately after the death of her husband the widow was ill for some time, and what little remained of the year's salary after paying these expenses was used in paying every dollar of indebtedness owing by the husband during his lifetime. So there was hardly a penny left for the poor widow, who to-day is working on a farm for $3 a week trying to support the two minor children. These are the facts. Under an Executive order in accidents of this kind on the Panama Canal two years' salary is paid to the widow or the heirs. It seems to me there ought not to be any objection to this small claim being paid to the widow under the circumstances. I do not think that all the salary was paid to the woman; but whether it was or not, she turned around and paid the rest to her husband's creditors.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I realize with the gentleman from Iowa that this is, of course, a case which excites the sympathies of every one of us, and I realize the gentleman desires to see this woman helped. I sympathize with him in his object in this case. I believe that under the compensation law which the Government has in existence now it does not pay a sufficient amount in cases of death or injury. But I also realize that if we commence now to open up these cases, which have all been settled on the same basis, although this may be a worthy one, as I believe it is, we ought to adjudicate all those that we have gone over in the past and allowed the one year's salary.

I remember in the district in which I live not very long ago a widow who was destitute, with minor children, wrote me in reference to a case similar to this, where her husband had lost his life in river and harbor work, which, I think, is under this law, and I could secure nothing more for her. I had passed through this House a bill a year or two ago for the widow of a man who lost his life while employed by the Bureau of Mines in Pennsylvania, and they paid but a year's salary. These two cases were cases that excited my sympathy as much as this case, and I regretted I could not secure more, but had to be content with the year's salary. I would be glad to consider a measure which would vote a larger amount for the widows or heirs of these people who lose their lives and leave them dependent. I do not believe that we do right in not paying these people more, but I do not think that we ought to single out any one particular case, but that if we take up one we should take up all of them. I can furnish the gentleman from Iowa just as sad a case as his own. I would like to see that widow with her little children receive more money. I know that treating the cases in this way there must be a favored few that would come in here, and for that reason, until we do get a proper law to determine to go back and adjudicate all the cases, I can not consent to have one go through without the others, and for that reason I must object to the consideration of this bill at this time. I hope that Congress will not long delay the passage of a law that will give ample compensation for death or injury. Our Government ought to be just to those in hazardous occupations. It is wrong for the Government to have these people in its employ and when they are killed not to make sufficient provision for those who are dependent, or if crippled they should be paid a due compensation.

PAYMENT FOR CERTAIN SERVICES, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15309) providing for the payment for certain services arising under the Navy Department.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums of money to the respective claimants enumerated herein, the same being the amount due said claimants for service rendered under the Navy Department as certified to the House by letter from the Secretary of the Treasury March 25, 1914: To W. F. Durand, Stanford University, California, $228.05; to Burton McCullom, Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, $325; to Pay Director J. S. Phillips, United States Navy, $70; to Pay Inspector Z. W. Reynolds, United States Navy, $529.93; to R. P. Andrews Paper Co., Washington, D. C., $21.15.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object.

EDWARD A. THOMPSON.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 335, H. R. 7287, for the relief of Edward A. Thompson.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to go back to Calendar No. 335. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is it?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. The case of Edward A. Thompson, a claim to which objection was made by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7287) for the relief of Edward A. Thompson.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Edward A. Thompson, to compensate him for the loss of his son, Harold A. Thompson, late a seaman on the U. S. S. Georgia, who was killed in the performance of his duty on said ship.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 5 strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$125.40." In line 6, after the word "Thompson," strike out the remainder of said bill and substitute the following words: "and said Edward A. Thompson shall be regarded as the duly designated beneficiary of the late Harold A. Thompson, a seaman on the U. S. S. Illinois, who was killed in the performance of his duty on said ship."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I want to ask the gentleman if this bill was introduced to pay the sum of $10,000?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And the committee reported $125. That is quite a compromise.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. It was not a compromise; it was a necessity.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MORRIS DIETRICH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10327) for the relief of Morris Dietrich.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Morris Dietrich, who was permanently disabled while engaged in the employment of the United States Government at Frankford Arsenal, in the State of Pennsylvania, on or about July 25, 1913, the sum of $5,000.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 10 strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

BENJAMIN E. JONES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1803) for the relief of Benjamin E. Jones.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Benjamin E. Jones, junior engineer, United States Geological Survey, the sum of $70, and said amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be in full of all losses incurred and damages sustained by him in an accident while engaged in the Government service.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

THOMAS E. PHILIPS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 858) for the relief of Thomas E. Philips.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Thomas E. Philips shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a corporal in Company B, Sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 11th day of January, 1863: Provided, That no pension, bounty, or allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out of line 7 the words "11th day of January" and insert in lieu thereof the words "20th day of October."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

S. L. BURGARD.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17004) for the relief of S. L. Burgard.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

JOHN MITCHELL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12161) to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell, late of United States gunboat Oriole, and issue to him an honorable discharge from the Navy of the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell, who served in the United States ships Great Western, Oriole, and Huntress, and to issue to the said John Mitchell, or in case of his death to his heirs or other legal representatives, a certificate of discharge: Provided, That no pay or bounty for any period of time during which the said John Mitchell was absent from his command without leave of absence shall accrue or be payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not know that I have any objection to passing a proper bill. This bill in the form that it is in would not do the man an earthly bit of good, if we passed it, because it does not provide for an honorable discharge, and it also purports to remove the charge of desertion and change the records, when the War Department holds that you can not do that. It is true the bill was drawn by the Navy Department. I do not know whether the President would veto it, but it would not grant the man a pension, and probably that is what he wants.

Mr. HAY. I will state that the President has vetoed similar bills heretofore drawn for the purpose of removing the charge of desertion from soldiers.

Mr. MANN. If this bill related to the Army, this would be vetoed.

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly; and I do not see any reason why the same rule should not apply to the Navy.

Mr. MANN. There is none, probably, except that in this case the Secretary of the Navy sent this over to the committee, but I do not suppose he knew anything about it personally.

But it does not provide for an honorable discharge nor does it provide that he shall be considered as having had an honorable dicharge. It would not do the man any good.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that this bill was drawn to conform to the statute passed in 1888, providing for the relief of certain men of the Navy or Marine Corps from the charge of desertion.

This law gave the Secretary of the Navy the right, in his discretion, to remove the charge of desertion standing on the records of the Navy against any enlisted man in the Navy or the Marine Corps who served in the Civil War, under certain conditions.

One condition required to exist in order that the Secretary of the Navy might exercise his discretion was that the enlisted man seeking relief must have faithfully served until May 1, 1865, having previously served six months or more.

This law also provided that when the charge of desertion was removed it was the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to issue a certificate of discharge to the said enlisted man, or, in case of his death, to his heirs or to his legal representatives.

The facts concerning the case of John Mitchell are as follows:

John Mitchell, in May, 1861, enlisted as a private in Company D, Third New York Volunteer Infantry, and after serving two years received an honorable discharge.

In March, 1865, Mitchell enlisted in the Navy for two years as a landsman, and served until August 26, 1865, when he deserted at Mound City, Ill.

Shortly before Mitchell's desertion his father had died, and prior to that one of his brothers had died in the war, and he went home at the urgent request of his mother, and, as he thought at the time, when there was nothing more for him to do, the war being over. It appears that he did not know that it was required to be mustered out.

Notwithstanding his honorable discharge for previous services in the war, Mitchell could not get the charge of desertion against him on the records of the Navy Department removed under the statute of 1888, because he had not served in the Navy six months prior to May 1, 1865.

The object of this bill is to clear up the Navy record of this man by removing the charge of desertion and by issuing to him a discharge certificate as provided by the law of 1888.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman wants an honorable discharge. This bill would not give it to him. It would not do the man any good to pass the bill. The President has repeatedly vetoed bills in this form. I am not willing to pass this bill in this form by unanimous consent and then say to the next man that I will not consent.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. This man already has one honorable discharge, and he is not asking for an honorable discharge in this bill. While the bill as originally introduced called for an honorable discharge, the change was made to the present form of the bill on the suggestion and recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, the idea of the Secretary of the Navy being that while Mr. Mitchell's case did not come within the letter of the statute of 1888, it came within the spirit of that statute.

Mr. MANN. But they were honorably discharged.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. The men who come within the spirit of the statute of 1888 did not get an honorable discharge. The statute simply requires that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to issue to these men a discharge.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

I. C. JOHNSON, JR.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11767) for the relief of I. C. Johnson, jr.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

RICHARD PHILLIP M'CULLOUGH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12064) for the relief of Lieut. Richard Phillip McCullough, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

COL. DAVID L. BRAINARD, QUARTERMASTER CORPS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 5293) for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

SETH WATSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1149) for the relief of Seth Watson.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Seth Watson, who was a first lieutenant of Company B, Twenty-eighth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 24th day of June, 1864: Provided, That no pay or bounty shall accrue or become payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

THOMAS G. RUNNING.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 663) for the relief of Thomas G. Running.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas G. Running the sum of $720 for injuries received while employed in the United States Forest Service during the year 1904.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is where I suppose, in an inadvertent moment, the committee decided to put in $2,500 instead of a year's salary. Does the gentleman desire to insist on that amendment?

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman this is a little different from the ordinary run of these cases. This man has totally lost his eyes. He is out there alone, and the committee thought in view of the fact he had lost the sight of both of his eyes that $720 was totally inadequate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, "totally inadequate." Of course it is totally adequate to recompense a man if we paid $50,000 for the loss of his eyesight.

Mr. POU. Well, there is a great deal of difference between $720 and $2,500 to a man who has nothing.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he will object in the event we agree to the Senate bill?

Mr. MANN. That is what I asked the gentleman, but I could not get an answer.

Mr. POU. I did not so understand the gentleman from Illinois. I am willing to accept the Senate bill if I can put it through without objection. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation carrying the sum of $720, as provided for in the Senate bill.

Mr. BUTLER. And that man is blind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation in the amount of $720, as provided in the Senate bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

So the bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BENJAMIN A. SANDERS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12198) for the relief of Benjamin A. Sanders.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Benjamin A. Sanders, the sum of $2,500, in full compensation for injuries received by him on December 26, 1912, while in the performance of his duties as an employee of the United States Government, being principal of the Uintah Indian boarding school, Whiterocks, Utah, by a flying piece of a broken emery wheel used as a part of the equipment of said school.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$1,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

V. E. SCHERMERHORN AND OTHERS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 4930) for the relief of V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection for just a moment.

Mr. MANN. I will be very willing to do so, although it is now 5 o'clock, but I shall object in the end. There is no merit in the bill, according to my opinion. I thought possibly I was expediting the rest of the calendar by objecting at this moment. I am not otherwise interested in it.

Mr. HELVERING. I do not know, but perhaps the gentleman has read this report very carefully.

Mr. MANN. I have read the report and I know what it is.

Mr. HELVERING. The gentleman undoubtedly believes the property was destroyed by the employees of the Government?

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the property was burned, not the slightest, but there is no evidence to show the Government had anything to do with it. If they had, they are not responsible. The people ought to carry insurance.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing the Senate report on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 461, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4930) for the relief of V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth, having considered the same, report thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

In line 7, strike out the figures "$6,250" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$2,767.45."

On page 2, line 2, strike out the figures "$7,592" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,109.45."

The facts in the case are fully set forth in the following proceedings of a board of officers convened at Fort Riley, Kans., which is appended hereto and made a part of this report:

Proceedings of a board of officers convened at Fort Riley, Kans., pursuant to the following orders:

A board of officers is appointed to inquire into and report upon the origin and circumstances of a prairie fire which occurred on this military reservation, near the northern boundary, on the 15th instant, and which is reported to have spread to and caused serious damage on the farm of Mr. Schermerhorn, adjoining the reservation.

The board will, if possible, determine the responsibility for the occurrence and estimate the amount of damage done outside of the reservation.

Detail for the board: Maj. John E. McMahon, Sixth Field Artillery; Capt. Charles R. Lloyd, Sixth Field Artillery; First Lieut. James W. Riley, Sixth Field Artillery.

By order of Col. Ward:

ERNEST HINDS, Adjutant General.

Special Order No. 240. HEADQUARTERS, Fort Riley, Kans., November 18, 1908.

2. Capt. Charles R. Lloyd, Sixth Field Artillery, is, on account of absence from the post, relieved as a member of a board of officers appointed by Special Order No. 213, current series, these headquarters, and Capt. Louis T. Boiseau, Sixth Field Artillery, is detailed in his stead.

By command of Gen. Kerr:

N. K. AVERILL, Captain, Seventh Cavalry, Acting Adjutant General.

The board convened pursuant to the above order has the honor to submit the following report:

Upon investigation the board finds that a grass fire was started on the morning of October 15, 1908, by Pvt. Marcele Bxdek, Battery A, Sixth Field Artillery. While the battery was engaged in target practice on Packers Hill, this soldier was standing near his wheel pair, in the position occupied by the limbers. While engaged in lighting his pipe, he was compelled to drop it suddenly in order to attend to his horses, and the fire from the pipe was communicated to the long grass. A high wind, which was blowing at the time, spread the fire rapidly, but it was eventually put out and guards stationed around the edges of the burned area to prevent the recurrence of the fire from stray sparks. These guards were removed when the battery returned to the post. In the afternoon of the same day another grass fire broke out, which spread rapidly, owing to the high wind, and which, in spite of the efforts made to extinguish it, extended to the farms north of the reservation, owned, respectively, by V. E. Schermerhorn, Philip Hudspeth, and G. W. Campbell. Part of Mr. Schermerhorn's farm is leased by E. C. Caley.

The amount of damage is estimated as follows:

G. W. Campbell, 2 loads of sorghum, at $8	$16
Philip Hudspeth, 16 tons hay, at $8	128
Philip Hudspeth, 20 bushels corn, at $0.30	6
E. C. Caley, 15 tons hay, at $8	120
E. C. Caley, 240 bushels corn, at $0.30	72

As regards the injury done the Schermerhorn orchard, the board has found considerable difficulty in determining the value of the damage. The fire spread irregularly through the orchard, singeing the trees and injuring the crop of apples at the time on the trees. Mr. Schermerhorn submitted a sketch of the burned area, together with an affidavit of his father, E. R. Schermerhorn, stating that the trees were valued at $10 each. The sketch and affidavit are forwarded herewith, marked "Inclosure 1." A careful examination of the burned area was then made by F. E. Conter, forester, quartermaster department, whose report and sketch are forwarded herewith, marked "Inclosure 2."

From these data it appears that there were 12.25 acres over which the damage was spread, but that the 637 tree spaces burned over cover an area of 9.12 acres. From the accompanying letter (inclosure 3) of Mr. Albert Dickens, head of the department of horticulture and forestry, Kansas State Agricultural College, it appears that the value of orchard lands similar to Mr. Schermerhorn's varies from $200 to $250 an acre. On this basis, allowing the claimant the 12.25 acres burned over, the actual damage done would be between $2,450 and $3,062.50. To this should be added $11.20, the value of 28 bushels of apples at 40 cents per bushel.

If, on the other hand, the damage be estimated by considering the number of trees actually destroyed, and allowing $10 per tree, as claimed by Mr. Schermerhorn, the damage would be as follows:

422 trees, 8 to 9 years, at $10	$4,220.00
6 trees, 1 to 2 years, at $1	6.00
31 sprouts, at 20 cents	6.20
28 bushels apples, at 40 cents	11.20
Total	4,243.40

Allowing a stand of 70 trees to the acre, the valuation of the trees at $10 each would make the orchard worth $700 per acre, which is believed to be excessive.

The board is of the opinion that it would be just to all parties concerned to assess the damage done as follows:

12.25 acres, at $225 per acre	$2,756.25
Total	2,767.45

From an examination made of the burned area and the testimony of the several officers and enlisted men who were detailed to superintend the putting out of the first fire, the board is not prepared to say that the second fire originated from the first. The evidence shows that all due precautions were taken to extinguish the original fire and to prevent its spread, and that when the second fire broke out in the afternoon immediate steps were taken to put it out. It is the experience of the members of the board that grass fires are continually breaking out on the reservation during the dry season, and that it is generally found impossible to determine their origin or cause. In view of the above, the board is unable to determine definitely the responsibility for the fire which caused the damage.

At the time of the fire Col. F. K. Ward, Seventh Cavalry, was in temporary command of the post, the commanding general being on sick report.

Approved.

It is not shown that either Col. F. K. Ward, Seventh Cavalry, commanding Fort Riley at the time of the fire; First Lieut. B. F. Browne, Sixth Field Artillery, the officer in command of Battery A, Sixth Field Artillery, on the drill day in question; or the United States is responsible for the loss referred to from fire.

J. B. KERR, Brigadier General, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS, Fort Riley, Kans., March 15, 1909.

Respectfully forwarded to the adjutant general, Department of the Missouri, Omaha, Nebr.

The board has very carefully investigated this matter, and the proceedings are forwarded for the information of higher authority.

J. B. KERR, Brigadier General, United States Army, Commanding.

[Second indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE MISSOURI, Omaha, Nebr., March 23, 1909.

Respectfully returned to the commanding general, Fort Riley, Kans.

The board will make an examination after June 1 and ascertain the number of fruit trees actually killed by the fire.

The board will also obtain the statements of the owners of the damaged property, as to the origin of the fire, and as to the efforts made by them to extinguish it and to protect their own property from destruction.

By command of Brig. Gen. Morton.

C. W. KENNEDY, Adjutant General.

HEADQUARTERS, Fort Riley, Kans., March 25, 1909.

Respectfully returned to Maj. John E. McMahon, Sixth Field Artillery, president of the board, inviting attention to preceding indorsement.

By command of Brig. Gen. Kerr.

ERNEST HINDS, Adjutant General, Commanding.

FORT RILEY, KANS., June 23, 1909.

The board met at 11.30 a. m.

Present: Maj. John E. McMahon, Sixth Field Artillery; Capt. Louis T. Boiseau, Sixth Field Artillery.

Absent: First Lieut. J. W. Riley, Sixth Field Artillery, absent with leave, per S. O. 96, headquarters Department of the Missouri, May 19, 1909.

The evidence of the property owners as to the measures taken to protect their property against damage by fire is forwarded herewith, marked "Inclosures 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12."

From an inspection made by the board, assisted by two foresters of the Quartermaster's Department, of the Schermerhorn orchard, it appears that an area of about 12 acres of the orchard has been cleared and planted in corn since the fire. The board found that the fruit trees had been removed from this area and were piled in three heaps on the adjoining ground. These trees were counted as carefully as possible and the number found to be about 625. From this it would appear that the amount of damages estimated by the board in the original proceedings is apparently correct.

There being no further business, the board adjourned sine die.

JNO. E. MCMAHON,
Major, Sixth Field Artillery, President.
L. T. BOISEAU,
Captain, Sixth Field Artillery, Member.

HEADQUARTERS,
Fort Riley, Kans., June 26, 1909.

Approved.

F. K. WARD,
Colonel Seventh Cavalry, Commanding Post.

JACOB M. COOPER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 754) for the relief of Jacob M. Cooper.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

MIRICK BURGESS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 5065) for the relief of Mirick Burgess.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Mirick Burgess, who was a private of Company I, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and of Company H, Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of the last-named company and regiment on March 28, 1863: Provided, That no pay nor bounty shall accrue or become payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I will withhold my objection long enough to say that this seems to me a clear case of desertion. As soon as the man had secured his bounty on his second enlistment and what was coming to him on his first enlistment he deserted from his second enlistment. He received, I believe, a bounty on his second enlistment; and as soon as he was sure of that bounty, a month or two after he enlisted and immediately after he secured his back pay, he deserted.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will examine the report, he will find——

Mr. MONDELL. I have examined it.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. He will see that this soldier after about a year's service was wounded and was in the hospital for quite a long while.

Mr. MONDELL. I saw that.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. While he was in the hospital he was reenlisted in another regiment, but he never joined the regiment. He remained at the hospital.

Mr. MONDELL. I was of the opinion he did join the regiment and was with the regiment for a short time, and the very day or the day after he received his full pay for his first enlistment, having in the meantime secured his bounty on his second enlistment, he deserted——

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think the record shows——

Mr. MONDELL. The very day or day after.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think the record shows that he never joined the Second Regiment.

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming that he never joined the Second Regiment, so much the worse.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. He was not fit for service, and remained for a considerable time in the hospital.

Mr. MONDELL. Then he should not have been accepted as a veteran volunteer and given a bounty if he was not in condition to join his company or his organization.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think if the gentleman will read the record——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the time of the committee except to say this, that a common sort of desertion—and I have gone over many cases in former years—are those of men who having served one brief enlistment, then enlisted as veterans, secured bounties, and a few days afterwards deserted.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I do not think that is the case here. I think if the gentleman will read the report he will be convinced that is not the case.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

PHILIP COOK.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 1063) for the relief of Philip Cook. The bill was read in full.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

CALEB T. HOLLAND.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17752) for the relief of Caleb T. Holland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Caleb T. Holland, who was a private of Company E, Sixteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 18th day of April, 1864.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this man deserted three separate and distinct times. I object.

Mr. HILL. Will you reserve your objection for a minute?

Mr. MONDELL. I will reserve my objection.

Mr. HILL. I know this man personally, and if you will read the record carefully—and if that is not sufficient I will get the complete report from The Adjutant General—you will find one of those desertions was at the time he was sick with typhoid pneumonia, and they lost track of him; but he went back to his company in a short time. The desertion you speak of was one that happened on the 18th of April, 1864, over in Indiana, when the regiment was moving. At this time, as the affidavit sets out fully—and the evidence is overwhelming—the captain of the company had a grudge against this man. He was charged with breaking into a barrel of rum, which I suppose he did not do, from overwhelming evidence, and it was charged he was going to be put in the guardhouse. Now, this man did not do any more than leave the service and join another company up at Indianapolis.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what all the bounty jumpers did.

Mr. HILL. I deny that this man was a bounty jumper, and this record says he did not receive any bounty. He did not receive any bounty at all.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no record from the War Department saying he did not receive a bounty.

Mr. HILL. They so stated in the report here.

Mr. MONDELL. Somebody might be mistaken. But if this man when he deserted and then reenlisted under an assumed name did not receive a bounty or some cash consideration, then I am very, very much mistaken.

There is nothing in the War Department records that I can see to indicate that he did not. He seems to have been an habitual deserter. He may be an exemplary citizen now. That is the unfortunate feature of some of these cases—that men who did things in their youth that they should not have done afterwards become very good citizens. But I do not believe that we should cure records of that kind. I do not think we should correct a record of that kind and place a man who was almost a professional deserter on the same footing with regard to the benefits of the pension laws and otherwise as a man who has honorably served his country.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

TITLE TO CERTAIN LAND IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11765) to perfect the title to land belonging to the M. Forster Real Estate Co., of St. Louis, Mo.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas it appears by satisfactory evidence adduced that the M. Forster Real Estate Co., of St. Louis, Mo., a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, is the equitable owner of all right, title, and interest in and to a parcel of land situated in city block No. 57 of the city of St. Louis and the State of Missouri, more particularly described as follows: Beginning at a point on the west line of Second Street north 17° 10′ east 64 feet 2 inches from the northeast corner of Second and Myrtle Streets; running thence north 72° 12′ west 160 feet 10 inches; thence north 17° 11′ east 6 feet 2 inches; thence south 72° 3′ east 160 feet 10 inches; thence south 17° 10′ west 6 feet 2½ inches to the place of beginning; bounded on the north by the claim of Fanny Deaver, on the south by the claim of Alexis Lalande's legal representatives, on the east by Second Street, and on the west by the claim of Marie Rose Lajoye and Helen Leroux's representatives. And it appearing further that legal title to said parcel of land is now vested in the United States of America, said legal title at no time having been granted, released, confirmed, or in any wise relinquished to the owner or owners of said land, and no survey thereof having been made by the United States; and

Whereas it appears further that said M. Forster Real Estate Co. and Marquardt Forster, its grantor, have owned and been in open, notorious, and continuous possession of said land for a period of more than 20 years, to wit, since the 9th day of June, 1890: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain parcel of land situated in the city of St. Louis and State of Missouri, said land being more fully described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point on the west line of Second Street north 17° 10′ east 64 feet 2 inches from the northeast corner of Second and Myrtle Streets; running thence north 72° 12′ west 160 feet 10 inches; thence north 17° 11′ east 6 feet 2 inches; thence south 72° 3′ east 160 feet 10 inches; thence south 17° 10′ west 6 feet 2½ inches to the place of beginning; bounded on the north by the claim of Fanny Deaver, on the south by the claim of Alexis Lalande's legal representatives, on the east by Second Street, and on the west by the claim of Marie Rose Lajoye and Helen Leroux's representatives, for which no confirmation has heretofore been granted or no survey made by the United States, be, and the same is hereby, granted, released, relinquished, and confirmed by the United States to the M. Forster Real Estate Co., a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, owners of the equitable title thereto, and to its successors and assigns, forever, as fully and completely in every respect whatever as could be done by patent issued therefor according to law: Provided, That the confirmation granted shall amount only to a relinquishment of any title that the United States has or is supposed to have in and to said land and shall not be construed to abridge, impair, injure, prejudice, or divest in any manner any valid right, title, or interest of any person or body corporate whatsoever, the true meaning and intent of this act being to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to said corporation, the M. Forster Real Estate Co., its successors and assigns, who would be the true and lawful owners of said land under the laws of the State of Missouri, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of said interest, title, and estate of the United States.

With committee amendments, as follows:

Amend by striking out all of the preamble.

Amend, page 3, line 8, by inserting, after the word "representatives,' the following: "as shown on the plat of the town of St. Louis, approved by the United States surveyor general on April 14, 1859, and on file in the General Land Office."

Amend, page 3, lines 9 and 10, by striking out the words "or no survey made by the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

COMMODORE T. E. DE WITT VEEDER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7848) for the relief of Ten Eyck De Witt Veeder, commodore on the retired list of the United States Navy.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

IDA SEYMOUR TULLOCH ET AL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16755) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to execute and deliver a deed in favor of and to Ida Seymour Tulloch, Roberta Worms, and Ethel White Kimpell for sublot 38 of original lot 17 in reservation D, upon the official plan of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to execute and deliver a deed in favor of and to Ida Seymour Tulloch, Roberta Worms, and Ethel White Kimpell, conveying to them in fee, as tenants in common, sublot 38 of original lot 17 in reservation D, laid out upon the low grounds of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, which lot was sold to Ambrose White on December 11, 1830, under the provisions of the act of Congress of May 7, 1822 (3 Stat. L., 691), but no deed of said lot was ever made under said act or under the act of Congress of July 1, 1879 (21 Stat. L., 47), to him or his successors in the equitable title thereof.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, by striking out the words "and directed" and inserting the words "at his discretion."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

OTTO L. WOLFSTEINER AND LILLIE M. THOMSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6201) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to execute and deliver to Otto L. Wolfsteiner and Lillie M. Thomson, of the city of Washington, D. C., as tenants in common, a deed conveying to them in fee the following-described part of lot 39, of reservation 10, of the low grounds, District of Columbia, on the west side of Third Street, north of Pennsylvania Avenue, city of Washington: Beginning at the northeast corner of said lot 39, thence south on the west side of Third Street 25 feet to the south end of said lot; thence west 150 feet; thence north 25 feet; and thence east 150 feet to the place of beginning, and known as the eastern part of said lot 39, which lot with others was sold to Judge Buckner Thruston in 1822, under the provisions of the act of Congress of May 7, 1822 (3 Stats., 691), but no deed was ever made to him, or his successors in title, from these United States for such eastern part of said lot 39.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "and directed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

DANIEL M. FROST.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 1807) for the relief of Daniel M. Frost.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Daniel M Frost be authorized to make a homestead entry for an unappropriated quarter section of public land, subject to said entry, as though his former entry No. 6595, Larned (Kans.) series, had not been made.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to allow said Frost credit for the residence and cultivation had by him in connection with said Larned entry as though it were had on said second entry when proof is submitted on the latter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I have some doubt as to the propriety of the first section of this bill to give this man the right to make another homestead entry, but on the facts stated in the report I have no doubt whatever that the second section ought not to be enacted, because it practically gives him scrip for 160 acres which he is not entitled to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. I do not understand that it gives him any such right. It gives him the right to go upon the public domain and make a homestead entry, and it authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to allow him credit for residence upon this new entry of the same length of time that he formerly resided on the other entry.

Mr. MANN. He was there long enough to buy the land—to commute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is just like issuing to him scrip for the land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. But that he might get after a year's residence; but on a homestead entry he would have to reside for five years.

Mr. MANN. The fact of the matter is that probably the man was guilty of collusion in making his first homestead entry, and he did not get it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object. The record discloses the fact that this man went upon this land believing it was subject to homestead entry and that another man by the name Weine attempted to make a preemption filing a month or so after Frost had made the homestead entry. This matter was contested and went before the Commissioner of the General Land Office and before the Secretary of the Interior, who both held that Mr. Frost had the right to make his entry. Afterwards, under a new Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Frost offered to pay or commute the price of the land—$110. An appeal was taken from that, and the new Secretary of the Interior then held on appeal that this land was not subject to homestead entry, but that it was subject to preemption. This man Frost having no right of preemption, having exhausted his right, of course could not take the land. Meantime, as the report shows, he had erected a house on the land and had lived there with his family. After this holding of the Secretary of the Interior, and after a patent had issued to this man Weine, Mr. Frost brought an action, which he carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, claiming that this man Weine held the land as a trustee for him—Frost. The court decided against him,

He pursued the matter for 10 years, attempting to get title to this land. He is now a resident of Uinta County, in my State. He is a very aged man and a poor one, and it seems to me under these circumstances, having acted in good faith, he certainly ought to have the right conferred by this bill. He carried his contest to the court of last resort. It seems to me that under these circumstances he ought to be allowed whatever residence he can prove to apply on the new homestead when he proves up.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course I do not know as to the value of the land which was in controversy for these 10 years. The controversy went to the Supreme Court of the United States. But I suspect it was more valuable than the ordinary homestead entry. This man made a homestead entry, and it was charged he made it by collusion with the land office. The report says:

It was charged that Frost made his entry by collusion with the register of the United States land office at Larned, who suggested to him the making of an entry for the land involved and accepted an application executed at Dodge City, instead of at the local office.

It is true that the department was not able to say that there was collusion. I think that what is stated in the report shows that there was collusion and that he was not a bona fide settler on the land. I am willing to let him have the right to make a homestead entry, but if what he wants is scrip worth a few dollars an acre, I do not think he is entitled to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. I would prefer to have the second section stricken out rather than to have the bill lost.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the man has a right now to make a homestead entry even if this bill did not pass. The only relief at all afforded by the bill is contained in section 2. If that were stricken out, the bill would be a nullity. A man who has heretofore lost his homestead right for any cause other than by fraud or for a valuable consideration has the right to make a second homestead entry under existing law. The fact is, Mr. Frost, now well advanced in years, and a pioneer in the Uinta Indian Reservation, recently opened to settlement, made a homestead entry and established a home on land which he believed was subject to homestead entry. His entry was contested on the ground that these lands under the terms of their cession as formerly a part of an Indian reservation could only be acquired under the preemption land law then in force. The question was by no means a clear one, and after several favorable decisions the case finally, on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, was decided adverse to him and he lost the land and improvements he had made and the time he had devoted to his entry in good faith. He now asks in this bill to simply have the time of residence on his former homestead apply on another homestead entry. He exhausted every remedy in defense of his former entry, and surely, from the decisions in his favor, he was justified in believing he had the right to make his former entry.

Mr. MANN. He seems to have been in this business a good deal.

Mr. HOWELL. No; there is nothing in the report in the case that warrants this imputation. The Assistant Secretary exonerates him from any charge of collusion. His chief and only offending was to make a bona fide homestead entry on lands that were afterwards held to be subject only to acquisition under the preemption law. It is true he had previously exhausted his right of preemption, but had a perfect right to make a homestead entry. Now that in his advanced age he has gone into a new country to aid in its development and settlement it is only fair and just that the time of residence on his former entry should be credited to him in making a home in the wilderness. He lost his former homestead, made in good faith, through no fault of his, but by the ambiguity of the laws applicable to the area embracing it, besides sustaining the heavy expense of protracted litigation in which the decisions varied for and against him. This bill provides but a small measure of relief, and I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] not to interpose his fiat of objection to its consideration.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

G. L. TANEYHILL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 1124) for the relief of G. L. Taneyhill.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I object.

HERMAN VON WERTHERN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 2472) for the relief of Herman von Werthern.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

AARON S. WINNER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 725) to correct the military record of Aaron S. Winner.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Aaron S. Winner, who was a private in Company H, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that company and regiment on the 25th day of July, 1865.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object.

JOHN P. FITZGERALD.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was an act (S. 2715) to amend the military record of John P. Fitzgerald.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object.

WALDO H. COFFMAN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was an act (S. 4023) for the relief of Waldo H. Coffman.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Waldo H. Coffman, formerly a private of the Ninety-third Company, Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company on the 18th day of August, 1913: Provided, That all pay and allowances due him on said date shall be allowed him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This is a Senate bill. It has been reported and acted upon in that body; it has been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. This party was tried in June and July, 1913, for two alleged statements. It was alleged that he had made some disparaging statement concerning the flag, and that he had made some disparaging statements concerning the Vice President of the United States who had just died. He was tried and dishonorably discharged from the Army and sentenced to imprisonment for two years. Afterwards, in reviewing the record, the Secretary of War came to the conclusion that the testimony did not justify the sentence, at least that portion of it that imprisoned the soldier, and that part of the sentence was remitted by the Secretary of War.

In reviewing the matter the question was raised as to whether or not the testimony showed that the soldier was at all guilty of the matter with which he was charged. The fact is that the principal charge against the young man was that he was a Socialist, and he, it seems, had become obnoxious on that account to some of his comrades. I appeal to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], to the Members of the House, that we should not try men for political offenses in the Army or out of it, and the worst that this young man was guilty of, it seems, was that he was a Socialist and did not hesitate on occasions to say so The bill has been favorably reported by the Senate and passed by the Senate, and has been favorably reported by the House, and it simply provides that hereafter in the administration of the laws he shall be considered to have been honorably discharged, and have his pay up to the time of the trial. The War Department, while not recommending the bill, thinks that is not an unreasonable thing to do in this case, and I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Minnesota will not object.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in view of what the gentleman from Kansas has said, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think we are going far afield, when, by act of Congress, we set aside court-martial decisions. I do not happen to know anything about this case, and therefore I am not justified in objecting, but I do think it is a very extraordinary proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN MINAHAN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5753) to correct the military record of John Minahan, alias John Bagley.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of John Minahan, alias John Bagley, late a private in Company K, Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to said John Minahan, alias John Bagley, an honorable discharge of date August 24, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of the pension laws John Minahan, alias John Bagley, late a private in Company K, Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in said company and regiment on the 24th day of August, 1864: Provided, That no back pay, back pension, back allowances, or emoluments shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John Minahan, alias John Bagley."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection for a moment.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve my objection for a moment.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as a very worthy case. It has been pending for a good, long time.

Mr. MANN. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to what is bothering me in connection with this bill. This man deserted. That is admitted. He enlisted again under a different name, as a substitute for another man who was subject to draft, and the Navy Department says that he did this for the purpose for securing a bounty. Of course he says he did not get the bounty. That is what is bothering me.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska understands that if as a matter of fact that he did not get the bounty, then there is no necessity for passing this bill, because there is a general act under which a man having an honorable discharge from his last contract of service and desertion from a former enlistment is forgiven. This man has not been able to prove that he did not receive a bounty.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Nor has the Government been able to prove that he did receive a bounty.

Mr. MANN. Why does a man desert from one command and enlist in another under a different name unless it be for the purpose of deceiving somebody and getting something? It is too plain for argument.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

THOMAS M. JONES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6421) for the relief of Thomas M. Jones.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

LUKE O'BRIEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6652) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Luke O'Brien.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I object.

JOHN C. SHEA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12566) for the relief of John C. Shea.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring the rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John C. Shea, who was a private in Company D, Forty-sixth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, shall be hereafter held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 30th day of May, 1863.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I notice, first, that the bill does not contain an amendment which the committee reported. I would like to inquire of some gentleman who is familiar with the matter what is designed to be accomplished by this bill. This man enlisted in Company D, Forty-sixth Regiment Massachusetts Militia Infantry, and obtained an honorable discharge from it. He then enlisted in another regiment and deserted.

This bill gives him an honorable discharge from a regiment from which he already has an honorable discharge, and it does not propose to give him an honorable discharge from a regiment from which he deserted. As the whole purpose is to get him within the pension law, he would not get a pension, but it only gives him an honorable discharge from a regiment from which he has an honorable discharge. What is the point of it?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from Illinois states is absolutely correct in regard to this bill——

Mr. MANN. If it had not been I would not have stated it.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. We know the gentleman is usually correct but not always infallible. The committee reported on this bill only within a few days, and this is the first time I have seen it, but the department recommends that his record be amended in regard to the other enlistment instead of the one which the committee have reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to call attention to the further fact that this gentleman served two whole days after his enlistment and receiving the bounty; it was two entire days before he finally deserted. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. MANN. I object.

MILES A. HUGHES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14711) for the relief of Miles A. Hughes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Miles A. Hughes shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company A, Sixteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, on the 27th day of June, 1864.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, after the word "sixty-four," by inserting the following: "Provided, That no back pension, back pay, or back allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, did I hear the Clerk read an amendment? The copy of the bill which I have has no amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair the amendment is in the bill which he has before him.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FRED GRAFF.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17464) for the relief of Fred Graff.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Fred Graff, who was commissioned by the governor of the State of New York as second lieutenant in the Seventy-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been duly enrolled and mustered in and attached to that regiment from the 25th day of October, 1863, until the 11th day of July, 1864.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I thought I inquired about this bill a moment ago. The usual amendment is not inserted in connection with this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "sixty-four," insert the following: "Provided, That no back pay, back pension, or back allowances of any kind shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee return to Private Calendar No. 303.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to return to Private Calendar No. 303. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that we did not consider that bill to-day, but began with Calendar No. 318.

Mr. MANN. Well, I shall object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois this is a bill which I called up not so long ago to which objection was made by the gentleman in reference to a grant of certain land to the Masonic lodge at Hot Springs.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and I objected to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. It is too late to take it up now.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and that the Chairman be directed to report to the House that the committee has had under consideration various bills and resolutions upon the Private Calendar which were laid aside, that sundry amendments have been agreed to, and that the committee recommends to the House that the said bills and resolutions, some with amendments and some without amendments, do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills and resolutions, and that he reported the same back to the House, some with amendments and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills and resolutions do pass.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered on all the bills and resolutions reported, to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill 4628 was reported——

Mr. MANN. No more business to-night.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask to agree to a conference report.

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, August 1, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15418) authorizing Maj. Clyde S. Ford, Medical Corps, to accept and wear the decoration tendered him by the Ottoman and Bulgarian Governments for services rendered in the Balkan wars, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1053), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16244) to amend section 98 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1055), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12674) to provide for the allowance of drawback of tax on articles shipped to the island of Porto Rico or to the Philippine Islands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1056), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHURCH, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5254) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to sell and convey a certain tract of land to the Mandan Town and Country Club, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1052), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LOGUE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 308) providing for a commission to complete the acquisition of lands for the extension of the Capitol Grounds, and providing for the payment thereof, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1054), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its power and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Norris	Smoot
Bristow	Hollis	Overman	Stone
Bryan	Hughes	Page	Sutherland
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pittman	Thornton
Chilton	Kern	Pomerene	Vardaman
Clapp	Lane	Reed	West
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	White
Colt	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Williams
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Cummins	Myers	Simmons

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. This announcement I will let stand for the day.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WHITE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is necessarily absent and is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there has been so much discussion about the term "unfair competition," what it means and what it does not mean, that I have undertaken to prepare a suggestion in the nature of an amendment to be inserted preceding the text of section 5. I am not offering it as the perfection of definition, but as a suggestion which I hope may meet with favor.

I want to say that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] worked out some definitions some time ago which he has at various times kindly handed to me, and in part this definition is, I think, adopted from the suggestions he has made. However, I have no notion as to whether this definition will suit him or not. I desire to read it and then send it to the desk in order that it may at the proper time be taken up.

I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, because he has challenged me several times to define "unfair competition," and out of pure love of the chairman, more than anything else, I have undertaken it.

The term "unfair competition" is hereby defined to embrace all those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices done or used with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

Mr. President, I do not at this time care to discuss it. I wish to make a correction in it.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he left out "espionage," which is a rather offensive form of unfair competition.

Mr. REED. I think that would come under the head of dishonest practices.

Mr. CHILTON. Of fraud.

Mr. REED. It might come under the head of fraud. I have not endeavored to classify every possible thing, but I have put enough of those practices in there so as to characterize the term and what the term is aiming at. I do not claim that it ought not to be amended; I do not claim that somebody can not produce a better one; but I do claim that it is infinitely better than nothing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment is in order at the present time as an amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it is.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether in his judgment his amendment or his definition would cover any other unfair practices than those enumerated?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; because the term is universally stated, "and all other"——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hope the Senator will have his amendment printed immediately.

Mr. REED. "And all other acts or devices" is the language, and here is where you get a chance for a court to have a rule of construction:

And all other acts or devices done or used with intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

I will say to the Senator from Montana, if he desires to put additional words in here I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I merely made the suggestion to indicate to the Senator how difficult it is to make a definition that will cover all cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state his inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senate accepted the substitute of the Senator from Ohio? Has it been acted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee has accepted it and withdrawn the original committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. But it has not yet been acted upon by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that the Senator from Missouri offered that amendment at this time. I have no disposition to preclude the fullest inquiry with regard to the subject of his amendment, but the issue between the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio and afterwards adopted by the committee and my amendment relates to another matter. It seems to me that it would be better to have the issue determined. Then, another matter, whether my amendment prevails or that of the Senator from Ohio, it can be amended in the respect found in the proposal of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it had not been my purpose to ask that this amendment be at this time voted upon. Indeed, I would very greatly prefer if it could lie over and be printed and have the full consideration and inspection of the Senate. I have no pride of authorship in it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest to the Senator that the amendment be printed immediately.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri wants his amendment made no matter whether my amendment is adopted or whether the amendment of the Senator from Ohio stands.

Mr. REED. Certainly. As I understand the parliamentary situation, we can vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and if that is accepted this amendment could then be properly offered, and if that amendment which is offered by the Senator from Iowa is defeated the amendment of the Senator of Ohio would then be before the Senate, and this amendment would be fully admissible at that time. So I do not care now to have it voted upon. I will ask that it be immediately printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct in part but incorrect in part. Should the amendment of the Senator from Iowa be adopted it will not be subject to further amendment until the bill gets into the Senate. But the Chair was in error in stating that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is in order. The Chair now thinks it is not in order, because the yeas and nays have already been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to direct my remarks to the Senator from Missouri. I agree with the Senator that there ought to be some definition of the words "unfair competition." I further agree that the definition ought to be such as will exclude all the ordinary efforts of competition except those which are directed to the destruction of competition in some way and at some particular point. But here is the danger that I see in the draft that has been made by the Senator from Missouri: By including a number of specified things that come within the definition it is easy to construe that other things which are left out are not within it.

Now, I am going to suggest a definition which I have drawn and which at least seems to me to be more apt in a general law. I want the attention of the Senator from Missouri to this language:

> The words "unfair competition" as used herein shall be construed to mean any acts or practices in trade or commerce which are intended or the natural consequences or results of which are to stifle or destroy competition at any point.

That is general, and yet it goes directly to the point that the competition must be such as is intended or the natural result of which will be to destroy or cripple competition at any particular point. Any of these acts or practices in commerce or trade are broad enough in a definition of that kind to include any possible practice the effect or result of which would be to stifle or destroy competition.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it would be better that we should not attempt to include certain defined practices, but leave all practices which have a general result or effect to come clearly within the definition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, would not the adoption of the definition as indicated by the Senator from North Dakota make successful competition unlawful?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The mere success of the competition would be included in the Senator's definition, it seems to me, if in effect it destroyed competition, if it was a perfectly legitimate competition and was successful, where one man got the business the effect of which had been to destroy competition. Do we want to declare successful competition to be unlawful if it is fair?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I do not think that criticism should be directed more to this definition than to the one which has been read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator read his definition again, then, and see?

Mr. McCUMBER. The whole idea is that the competition must be unfair, it must be unjust, and it must be for the purpose of destroying competition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator is trying to give a definition of what unfair competition is, and, if I understand it, his definition of "unfair" is if the effect of the competition is to destroy competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the contrary, I am trying not to extend or expand the meaning but to limit it to those cases only in which the purpose or the natural and logical result of it is to destroy competition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator kindly have his definition repeated?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment that has been suggested by the Senator from Missouri is not before the Senate, save to be printed and thereafter considered. The question is on the amendment that I have offered as a substitute for that of the Senator from Ohio. Is this debate upon the proposed amendment of the Senator from Missouri in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would hardly rule on a question of that character, but the Chair is clear that it would be more appropriate to discuss this amendment later, after the vote is had.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the whole question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Of course, that is open to discussion until the roll call has commenced. One of the phrases which is used in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is "unfair competition." It may be, as has already been indicated by the Chair, that some of us would prefer to have that term defined before voting on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa; in other words, we would like to have some kind of a definition to indicate what the courts are to consider "unfair competition" to mean. It does not make any difference whether that definition is made in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa or in any other amendment that may be agreed upon, whether in the substitute or in the original. There ought to be some kind of a definition of "unfair competition," so that the average business man may know what it means.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, I will say that I find a very general sentiment expressed regarding an immediate vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, which relates, of course, to the question of court review. The question of the definition itself will come up later on. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota, in the interest of expedition, that the roll call has been ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Iowa should carry, could his amendment then be amended, after it had been adopted, before the bill is reported to the Senate? I think not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the proper place to perfect an amendment that is to be voted upon is before that amendment is disposed of as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator is correct in that view. If the amendment is sought to be pressed before the bill gets into the Senate, it will have to be urged now.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I will say that if the Senator is desirous of taking a vote at the present time, really, in the end, there will be very little difference whether the other proposition is voted on now or voted on in the Senate. I shall not urge the amendment at this time, if that will facilitate a vote.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am greatly obliged to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota asked me a question some time ago, and I have been trying to answer it. The Senator's question is a very proper one, which naturally occurs to a lawyer—whether by specifying certain acts we do not exclude others; whether if we undertake to include others by a general clause, the rule of ejusdem generis does not apply? It is true that if you specify certain acts, and stop with that, others are held to be excluded, but where you add a general term the rule or doctrine of ejusdem generis does not apply if you make it plain that it is not intended that it should apply. The Senator has not the amendment before him, but when it is printed I think he will find on examination that both of those difficulties have been avoided, because after these various acts have been specified follows a general phrase:

> And all other acts or devices done or used.

Now, we get the intent and we get the definition of those other acts and devices in these words:

> Done or used with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

I say to the Senator that I had both of those qualifications in my mind, and I sought to draw this amendment so that it will avoid both of them. It is very broad in its terms, and yet it is not so broad that there is not a guide set up by which the business man and the lawyer advising the business man has the path marked out. It is intended to prohibit everything in the nature of concealment—that is, secret, underhanded methods, threats and coercion, which is a weapon often employed, deceits, frauds, dishonest practices, false representations, and slanders of business. Those terms will cover, I undertake to say, every practice that has ever been indulged in, if you stop there; but I do not stop there. I have included in the amendment general language, so that any man reading it can tell the character of acts that are prohibited, and any commission enforcing the law can tell the general character of acts, as can any court. While I do not claim that the amendment is necessarily perfect, I trust the Senator from North Dakota will carefully examine it when it is printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will make an announcement at this point. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who has been occupying the chair, has ruled that an amendment to the so-called Cummins amendment was not in order at this time, because the yeas and nays had been asked for on its adoption. The Secretary now advises the Chair that there has been no such order of record, either in the RECORD or in the Journal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Chair kindly repeat his statement. I was engaged for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair made an announcement to correct a misapprehension under which the Senator from Nebraska, while occupying the chair, labored. A Senator offered an amendment to the amendment, and the Senator then occupying the chair decided it was not in order, because the yeas and nays had been ordered on the adoption of the so-called Cummins amendment. The Secretary now advises the Chair that there is no such order of record.

Mr. CUMMINS. That accords with my recollection, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if his amendment provides for any form of appeal by one making complaint to the trade commission, in the event that the trade commission does not grant the remedy to which the complainant believes he is entitled?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not. As I said yesterday, that involves opening up everything for a trial de novo. It is impossible to avoid that, if one who is denied relief is given the right to appeal; but I may say that this is not an adversary proceeding. The complaint is initiated by the commission and not by a third person.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is there any provision for a complaint being made by a third person?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, certainly; anyone has a right to file a complaint with the commission, and if the commission has reason to believe that this section of the law is being violated, it then serves notice of the complaint upon the person or corporation violating it and calls him or it before the commission.

Mr. PITTMAN. What would be the remedy of the complainant—that is, the individual or corporation suffering from oppressive acts complained of—if it should transpire that the trade commission had tendencies in favor of the oppressive corporation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Such a person would sue the offending corporation or association to recover damages.

Mr. PITTMAN. But he would have no remedy through the proposed commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not; I hope not. This is a proceeding, as I said yesterday, for the benefit of the people of the country. It is intended to prevent unfair competition. Its enforcement is precisely like that of a criminal statute; society enforces the statute; society, through the commission or through the Government, enforces the law, leaving each individual to the recovery of his damages according to the law, but not through the commission, which is a representative of the Government. That is the theory of the interstate-commerce law, and that is the theory of this proposed law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just a moment, before the question is submitted. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] expressed his views this morning very forcefully and very learnedly, as he always does when he discusses a legal proposition, and I want to submit to the Senate just a few words in reply. I am not going to take the time to discuss the measure in full, because that has been done heretofore.

The Senator from Arkansas and others seem to be content with the practice under the interstate-commerce act and to feel that the practice under the proposed act should be patterned after it. I accept that theory in part, but not in full. It does seem to me that there is a very radical difference between the classes of questions which will come before the two commissions. In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, on one side of the controversy there is always a common carrier and on the other side a shipper.

I recognize the fact that for many years there has been great resentment against the common carriers because of the discrimination practiced by carriers as between shippers and because of the exorbitant rates charged in many localities; but the situation, so far as it applies to the pending bill, is entirely different, in my judgment. Except for the amendment which has just been proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], there has been no attempt to define what "unfair competition" means, and, with all due respect to his effort, I do not believe that we could satisfactorily define that term now if we were to attempt to do so. Then, we are compelled to place one of two constructions upon this phrase—either the one for which I contend or the one which is broader and more comprehensive and embraces every sort of practice that may now be in vogue or which may hereafter be conceived in the commerce of the country.

We can not think of business without thinking of competition. If two corporations are engaged in selling articles of the same kind, there is necessarily competition of some kind. There are between 300,000 and 400,000 corporations in this country, and there are 100,000,000 people all engaged more or less actively in some kind of business. Under the amendment which is proposed by the committee, of course, we limit the application of the provisions of this bill to corporations, while under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa there is no limit; it applies to individuals and partnerships as well as to corporations.

Now, what is the situation? We are proposing to refer to a commission of five men every question which is involved in the multifarious practices of a hundred million people for those five men to determine, in their judgment, what is fair competition and what is unfair competition. I submit that to give all of this power over all the business of this vast country to the keeping of five men, a part of whom may be learned in the law and a part of whom may not be, dependent upon the wisdom of the President as his wisdom may be approved by the Senate of the United States, and to say that the Congress is going to surrender its legislative power and the courts are to surrender their judicial power in large part to this body of five men without an opportunity for a full review on the record below is to me incomprehensible.

Senators who have been favoring this bill on the floor of the Senate have time and time again spoken against the encroachments by the executive power upon the legislative power of Congress, and now, by one single act, they are seeking to transfer all the legislative power and much of the judicial power to this single commission of five men. With all due respect to their judgment—and I have a profound respect for the judgment of those Senators who differ from me upon this subject—I feel that we have not arrived at that time in the history of this problem when we should be willing to clothe this commission with almost superhuman power. It is proposed to give to this commission a power which is greater in its consequences than that which now devolves upon the Supreme Court of the United States.

On the other hand, the Senator from Arkansas is no more zealous than I am in the desire to expedite litigation. The law's delay has been a menace, not only to the profession of the law but to all branches of business. I agree with him that when we do anything toward limiting the law's delay we are doing a service to our country; but I can not get away from the fact that this commission should be subject to a full and a complete review by the courts of the land.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, does the Senator understand that "the courts of the land," to which he refers, consist in the first instance of one district judge?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And, upon appeal to the court of appeals, of three judges? It leaves it at least to four persons instead of five; primarily to one, because the cast which is given to a case by the nisi prius judge is in very rare instances changed. It is only his obvious errors in assuming certain things to be true. You would appeal, in other words, from five to one.

Mr. POMERENE. That is very true; but the Senator from Arkansas would leave to this tribunal the right to pass upon the facts, and substantially declare that certain practices are or they are not a violation of what they may conceive the law to be, without giving to the commission any guide whatsoever, and without giving to the courts above the full power of review, which, I think, they should have upon the record below.

I believe that the amendment which I have proposed can be modified so as to meet to some extent the views of the Senator from Arkansas; and since the Senate convened this morning——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Permit me to say that I have not any views about it. My views are entirely borrowed from the beaten path laid down by the Congress of the United States, and confirmed and clarified by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I simply accept an opinion that has been handed over to me by tribunals that I am bound to respect.

Mr. POMERENE. That is all very true; and if we were to follow the Senator's logic to its final conclusion, we would say, as to all questions which may be the subject of litigation, "We shall refer them to a commission of five men and allow them to pass upon and determine the merits of the case."

To meet in part the views of some of the Senators, after conferring with members of the committee, I am going to ask the permission of the Senate to modify the amendment which I offered the other day by striking out, on page 3, the following language, beginning on line 7 and ending on line 18:

Upon such final hearing the findings of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, but if either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is competent and material, and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may allow such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or before a master appointed by the court, and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem just.

And by inserting in lieu thereof, before the period on line 7, the following:

On the record of the testimony so returned.

So that the hearing in the district court will be upon the record as it comes to that court from the commission.

I ask permission to modify the pending amendment in that behalf.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. Where does that amendment come in? Where is it inserted?

Mr. POMERENE. On page 3, beginning on line 7. I propose to strike out all of the bill beginning with the words "Upon such final hearing" and going down to the word "just" in line 13.

Mr. CULBERSON. Beginning in line 8.

Mr. KERN. Line 9.

Mr. POMERENE. No; line 7. I think perhaps the Senators may have a different print.

Mr. KERN. The Senator proposes to strike out those words?

Mr. POMERENE. To strike out the sentence beginning with the words "Upon such final hearing," on line 7, and ending on line 18 with the words "conditions as to the court may seem just."

Mr. KERN. That is stricken out?

Mr. POMERENE. That is stricken out; and then there is inserted, on line 7 before the period and after the word "hearing," the words "on the record of the testimony so returned."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall not prolong the debate on the amendment. I rise simply to say that the change just suggested by the Senator from Ohio makes his amendment worse rather than better, and it does not in any degree change the essential issue between the plan which he has proposed and the plan which I have proposed.

I again ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to what the Senator from Ohio has said. I agree, if I understand what he has said, with his criticism upon the powers conferred upon the commission in this bill. I do not, however, understand how he, entertaining the views which he has expressed so eloquently and so incisively and so clearly as to the undesirability and unlawfulness of the attempt to confer upon this commission the jurisdiction contained in section 5 of the bill, can think that the criticism he has made is at all alleviated by the amendment which he proposes.

If section 5 does confer or attempt to confer judicial power upon this commission, it is absolutely void. If it attempts to confer legislative power without laying down the standard or primary rule within which the power conferred may be exercised in the discretion of the commission, it is absolutely void. The Senator from Ohio apparently thinks it attempts to confer both judicial and legislative power upon the commission. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] yesterday, in a lawyerlike and statesmanlike exposition of section 5, argued that it confers judicial, legislative, and executive power upon the commission, and authorizes the commission to bring suits in the courts of the United States in addition to the exercise of legislative and judicial power. I agree with him. How any lawyer who wants to preserve separately the three departments into which the powers of the Government of the United States are divided by the Constitution can consent to see them scrambled together in section 5, as they are in this bill, and criticize the scrambling process, and then vote for it on the ground that there can be a review of an order of the commission by a court, I fail to comprehend.

Mr. President, I think section 5 should be stricken from the bill. I do not think it is any answer to that to say that the bill would be emasculated if that were done. That is the fault of the bill. If the bill has an unconstitutional section in it, and if there is no cause for the creation of such a great and expensive commission except that it may be allowed to exercise powers which are unconstitutional, then there is no cause for the creation of that expensive and meddlesome commission. Of course, if the commission is to exercise or attempt to exercise the powers attempted to be conferred upon it by section 5, it is better, in my opinion, that there should be some sort of a court review, although I think there will be a way of testing the constitutionality of the act without the review provided by either of the pending amendments.

I think the first time the bill encounters the Supreme Court of the United States, as it will, it will be declared to be void in section 5. Then, in my opinion, the chief reason for the existence of the bill, in the opinion of its friends, will have been removed, and it will have no reason for its existence except as a wasteful, extravagant, meddlesome, undemocratic, un-American concern in this country. It is suggested that according to some Senators the balance of the bill will go with the body; and if section 5 is the body, the sooner the balance does go with it the better, in my opinion.

Mr. President, at first I was inclined to vote for the so-called Cummins amendment, the pending amendment, because at least that is consistent with itself. Instead of saying, as section 5 of the pending bill does, that unfair competition is the thing that is declared unlawful, and then, as section 5 of the bill does, proceeding to empower the commission to prohibit only unfair methods of competition, which in my opinion may be an entirely different thing, I prefer the Cummins amendment in that respect, because the Cummins amendment authorizes the commission to prohibit what the bill declares to be unlawful. The pending bill authorizes the commission to prohibit one thing, and declares to be unlawful another, and results in an absurdity, in my opinion, and a jumble; and I think that is dangerous to the bill, if anybody wants to see it preserved.

The Cummins amendment provides that unfair competition is declared unlawful, and the commission is given authority to prevent such unfair competition, which I think is a correct use of language in the sense that it is uniform. The Cummins amendment also authorizes the commission to prohibit what the bill declares to be unlawful by whomsoever the offense is committed. The Pomerene amendment does not. The Cummins amendment provides that whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating the provisions of the section it shall issue and serve upon the defendant a complaint. The Pomerene amendment simply provides that when a corporation has committed unfair competition it shall have the complaint served upon it. If, however, the Pomerene amendment prevails, and section 5 of the bill is left as it is, the multimillionaires of the country may compete unfairly in commerce to their hearts' content, whereas some small corporation that is competing with another of medium size will have the commission upon its back in no time. If unfair competition is an offense at law, if anybody can ascertain what it is, it ought to be prohibited and punished, no matter by whom committed.

In the multiplicity of the cul de sacs into which one wanders while he is trying to steer his way through the intricacies and contradictions of this bill, one is really at times in some difficulty to point out clearly all the troubles that occur to him as he attempts to tread the labyrinth.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator understand that under the Pomerene amendment if a corporation is engaged in the same line of business and in active competition with a partnership engaged in a like business and in like competition that would be condemned by the law as to one competitor and would not be condemned by the law as to the other? Suppose they were both pursuing the same practices, and both, as a matter of fact, were unfair, and they were in competition with each other. The unfair competition of the corporation would be under the ban of the law and the equally unfair competition of the partnership would not be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is perfectly true unless the term "partnership" would be included within the definition of what constitutes a corporation in the first part of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not contended that a partnership would be within the definition of a corporation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was led to make the observation I did because a few days ago the Senator from Tennessee [Mr.

SHIELDS], in commenting upon the definition contained in the first part of the bill, said that the term "corporation"—the bill providing that it shall include joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock organized to carry on business for profit—would, in some of the States, take in partnerships, because in his State and in some other States to which he referred partnerships had shares of capital, whether they issued stock against the interest or the shares or not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I will change my inquiry and make it as to an individual engaged in a like business with a corporation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Absolutely so, as to that distinction. Under the Pomerene amendment and under the bill the only unfair competition that is prohibited is that of corporations. As I say, rich men——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, to be concise, the bill aims, not at the practice but at the association or corporation which engages in the practice. The bill, then, does not aim per se to stop or punish unfair competition, but only to stop it when it is performed by certain associations or corporations?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; that is true. The bill aims to punish it when it is committed by corporations, because that is the only case in which the commission is authorized to prohibit it; but the bill in its terms prohibits it without limitation, because section 5 begins by saying:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but the purport of the bill is that unfair competition in commerce refers only to such competition as is carried on by corporations or associations. The same act or series of acts carried on by an individual would not, under the terms of the bill, be unfair competition, and would not come under the ban of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it would come under the ban of the bill, and if the Senator will allow me I will be very brief in elucidating why I think so. What comes under the purport of the bill is perhaps to be inferred from what the Senator's interpretation of all the provisions of the bill may be. Section 5 is the only section which attempts to prohibit or to stop unfair competition, and it is that section I am discussing. The bill provides in other parts of it about other things, but section 5 sets up a new offense in this country, if the friends of the bill are to be believed, to be known as unfair competition, and it is declared by the bill to be unlawful.

As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] said yesterday, the bill does not say whether it is a crime or a misdemeanor or whether it is unlawful, and the only penalty is that it may be prohibited. There appears to be no penalty in the bill for it except an order to desist and stop. If we can have a crime or a misdemeanor in this country with no penalty attached to it, it apparently is not a very serious offense. But yesterday the Senator from Tennessee gave it as his opinion, in his very able speech, that anybody who was injured, the competitor who was injured, or anybody else who was injured by the unlawful competition would have a remedy at law and could sue in damages in a civil action and collect merely by proving that his opponent had committed an offense at law, that he had done something which was unlawful, and the Senator cited the cases which have held that a person injured by a trolley car, for instance, if the company operating the car which had committed the injury were violating a city ordinance, could recover because the company had broken the law. So, in my opinion, neither of these amendments, if adopted, will cure the inherent and constitutionally incurable defects of section 5 if it is permitted to stand.

I shall vote for one or the other of them, because then, at least in the bill on the face of it, it will purport not to make the judgment of this commission absolutely final, and it will give a chance for some court, some legal officer, as distinguished from whoever may constitute the membership of this commission, to state what Congress meant when it declared something to be unlawful. However reactionary or old-fashioned it may be, I must admit that I have within my being something that tells me that it is safer for society and for the rights of individuals who may be oppressed to be allowed in an orderly manner to have a court adjudicate whether they have committed an offense or not, rather than to have an administrative commission appointed by the President do it.

I may be entirely wrong in that feeling. It may be that the decisions as to violations of statutes in this country ought to be taken away from the courts and that a commission should be established here, whose judgment should be final, to decide whether men have or have not violated the law of this country; but that theory is utterly antagonistic to everything that I have been taught, and to everything that I believe, and to everything that I thought our fathers had fought for when they obtained the liberties that we supposed had been guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

I think everyone would feel safer with the orderly process and judgment of a court. If these words mean anything or can be judicially decided to mean anything, then it would be left to the arbitrary notion of three out of five of some commissioners who have not yet been appointed and who, the friends of the bill say, are to be appointed, not because they are lawyers but because they may be skilled in the practice of business, experts in business methods. Whatever may be the value of having expert advice or expert opinion upon a matter, I do not think a mere expert in business is per se and on that account a better judge of the interpretation of the statutes that Congress may pass than the duly constituted judiciary of the country.

As I said, I suppose that is utterly out of touch with modern thought; but if it is, so be it. I do not believe in this sort of government. I do not care what the consequences are or what the penalties are for my disbelief, or whether it is schismatic or what not, I in my conscience am satisfied that my view is right. I am satisfied of it when the attempt is made to have commissions in this country interpret what the law phrases of Congress mean, and who have committed offenses that Senators stand here from day to day and admit their utter inability to define. It is a process which the able Senator from Tennessee, who has been the chief justice of the supreme court of that great State, says is equivalent to making a retroactive statute, a process which, to my mind, is equivalent to the passing of an ex post facto law, a process which upon the mere printing in the Government Printing Office here of the words "unfair competition" and the declaration that it is unlawful, accompanied by a debate in which nobody here is wise enough to define the offense, is perilous to enter upon. It gives this commission the power to summon a person before it and to find him guilty of a violation of the law and order him to stop it for an offense committed a week or a year before that time, before anybody had decided that the facts which they say constitute a violation of the law would, in fact, be a violation of the law.

I do not think that is American. I think if Congress wanted to set up a new offense in this country, it is the business of Congress to tell the people what shall constitute that offense. That may be all wrong. I know when we say murder is unlawful and shall be punished by death, we say what shall constitute the offense of murder.

We say it shall be the unlawful, premeditated killing of a person. That is some definition to a man. He knows now what murder is. We say that stealing shall be the taking and carrying away of some personal property in the possession of another. People of ordinary intelligence can tell what it is when we would prohibit stealing, if we did it. We do not, of course, but State laws do. We say that burglary is the unlawful breaking and entering into an inclosure or a building, and that is made a felony. But here we say unfair competition is unlawful, and there is not one of us, or all of us together, able to tell the people who the commission may in the future decide have committed that offense what things they are to do in order to commit it, or what things they are to refrain from doing in order to be sure that they have not violated the law, and that in a bill in response to a message of the President of the United States calling upon Congress to help the poor, puzzled business man, who is now under the operation of the Sherman law prohibiting restraints of trade, by illuminating him as to exactly what he can do and what he can not do.

The junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] yesterday read the President's message in which he stated substantially that the experience of the country had now sufficed, and the people of the country demanded that the Congress should lay down a definite, precise rule, should define the offenses, the specific acts which should be prohibited, so that the honest business men of the country who do not want to violate the law may not be trapped or punished for doing an unlawful thing when they had no intention of doing an unlawful act.

Mr. President, I regard this bill as utterly irresponsive to the message of the President. I regard the bill as seriously defective in many other parts. This is one of the worst of them; but I think the inquisitorial features of the bill are simply outrageous.

I think the point made by the Senator from Tennessee yesterday in his speech, that Congress, having no jurisdiction whatever over intrastate commerce, but only over commerce among the States, in conferring upon this commission the authority to investigate every corporation which at all is engaged in commerce among the States, as to its organization, its relation to other corporations, and its practices, its methods, its financial standing, and so forth, it is impossible to limit the examination there to be made to the constitutional function of Congress to regulate commerce among the States.

The intrastate commerce of these corporations is adequately protected now, and the people of the States are adequately protected by their own State laws; but all those things, including the organization of the company which is organized by the home State, are attempted to be placed under the jurisdiction and control of this commission, and the two things are inextricably mingled.

The attempt is made all the way through this legislation and the debates on it to justify it on the ground that it is analogous to and almost perfectly parallel with the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Mr. President, it differs as broadly from that as the night does from the day. This is the attempt and the first assertion of the wisdom of the Congress of the United States to reach out and regulate the details of private business. The private business of this country is charged with no public use.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. WEST. Does not the Senator think there is a difference as wide as the gulf between private business and corporations in the nature of a public utility?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do, Mr. President. Of course nobody will deny the right of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, no matter by whom conducted. The question is as to the wisdom of this Central Government here at Washington setting up a Federal tribunal to visé the transactions and approve or disapprove the practices and methods of the various trade associations of this country in private business, business that men engage in with no idea of benefiting the public at large in any way except that it is a good thing to have business in a country, charged with no public use, not offering to serve everybody alike, not common carriers, with the right to sell to whom they please at the price they please and to compete in any way they please within the law. The question is as to the wisdom of the Federal Government here at Washington attempting to regulate all the attempts of the different corporations which are rivals for business to get business.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the business of this country can be conducted by a Federal commission sitting here at Washington. I do not believe if the business men understand this bill that they favor it. I do not believe that it will be possible over 48 sovereign States, with their rights to charter their own corporations to do their business as they want and as they are accustomed to do it, for a Federal tribunal at Washington, with men appointed by the President of the United States to hold office for seven years apiece, adjudicating from day to day upon complaint before that commission of the hundreds of thousands and millions of devices which the various agents and drummers of these corporations competing among themselves by mail by all sorts of different business devices can use. I do not believe that the business of the country can be conducted in that way. It is insufferable and intolerable. The only reason I can give why the business men have not protested against this more vigorously than they have is, first, they do not know what is in the bill; second, many of them would not thoroughly understand the legal points involved if they did; third, they fear to come on here to make a fight against what they do not want and what would be injurious.

Mr. GALLINGER. They would be called lobbyists if they came, would they not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They would not come because they would fear they would be headlined in the newspapers over the country as insidious lobbyists.

Mr. GALLINGER. And haled before the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And investigated by the "lobby" committee or some other Federal institution. They have their wives and their families and their reputations and their standing in their communities, and they are not anxious for that sort of notoriety. Many of them are trusting in the Lord in some way to avert this calamity. Many of them are sticking their heads under the sand and hoping that it will hit the other fellow and that they will escape. Many of them are under the delusion that this inquisition is simply going after the fellow whom they regard as the fellow who is using unfair methods to compete with them, while they themselves think that their methods, of course, are all fair and all right, and think no doubt that the commission would always find that they were all right and that it was their competitor who was doing the unfair thing.

As I said the other day, no lawyer ever had a client who would admit that he intended anything except what was just and right and reasonable and fair, and he could not understand how the other fellow who was claiming the other thing could be an honest man if he claimed it.

We do not agree about what is right and fair. We do not agree among ourselves about what constitutes senatorial courtesy. We are all the time complaining of each other that our fellow Senators do not treat us fairly. I am not always disposed to leave it to some Federal tribunal, but this offense is not made one capable of definition, and therefore it can not be ultimately made an offense.

Everybody agrees with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] or was it the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who stated this morning that what was fair or unfair would vary with the moral perceptions of the people who decided it, and, of course, it will. You might just as well attempt to get the men who differ about religion to agree upon a common religion that they would all adopt as to agree upon a thing that they would all say was fair. You can not go to a ball game without fearing that the umpire will get mobbed because he has made an unfair decision.

This tribunal, this unknown tribunal—five men—are to be selected from somewhere, from men familiar with large business, in which case the cry will at once be raised that the administration has sold out to the interests, or else men who do not know anything about business and hence are unfit to judge of their fellow business men, in which case the business men will say that they are being persecuted.

I am perfectly certain that this sort of government by commission can not go on in a free country. I am perfectly certain that a commission of honorable men with the best intentions can not perform, to the satisfaction of the country, the duties imposed upon it here.

The Supreme Court of the United States, charged with enforcement of section 5, could not administer it for one year without producing riot in the country. You can not legislate a moral perception about which men may differ, which we admit our inability to define, and make it unlawful, and let it go at that, and run away from the definition, and say we know we can not define it; we do not know what it means, therefore we will shovel it onto the court, and then we will denounce the court and "sick" the people on the courts if they set the law aside as being void for uncertainty, when we admit ourselves that it is so uncertain that we can not touch it with a definition; and when the courts decide that it is absolutely void, un-American, unpatriotic, and an outrage upon a free country, then the demagogues will raise their voices against the courts. But the courts will do their duty regardless of the consequences—I am certain of that—and if they do not the people will do their duty.

They will send men down here who will decline to vote to perpetrate such outrages upon a free country. They will demand the repeal of this sort of government by commission, the people being put in leading strings all over this country.

We are told about business being poor and nothing but confidence lacking to its being good. Do you suppose you can make business men move freely, with confidence, go out with enthusiasm to compete with each other by putting upon every one of them a hair shirt which is going to itch at every pore every minute, and put a Federal detective back of him and expect him to harry him by every competitor with whom he competes, writing him letters saying if he does not submit to that particular thing he will complain and the Federal trade commission will drag him down to Washington? Is that what is called the "new freedom" in this country? That is what I want to know. If it is, we are getting our new freedom, emancipation proclamations, declarations of independence, and all that twaddle talk from ancient Egypt, buried 10,000 years ago, where it ought to have stayed buried, with its back to the resurrection.

There is no sense in this sort of government, or attempt at government, of a free, intelligent people by such half-baked legislation as that. I shall vote for one of these amendments, so that at least the man who has been arbitrarily sentenced by this commission can get before a civil tribunal if the bill has to be passed, and then I shall vote against the bill on its passage.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words and only a few words with reference to the amendment as now proposed by the Senator from Ohio. Ordinarily I am disposed to follow the lead of the committee of the Senate which has devoted much time and thought to the preparation of a bill or an amendment to a bill. Ordinarily I do that unless my own judgment is so at variance with that committee as to be irreconcilable.

As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as he now proposes to amend it, it would not permit the district judge to open up a case coming to him in such way as to hear new or additional evidence from that heard by the commission.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator is correct except that perhaps I should add that the commission on the introduction of any new evidence may at any time modify any former order it may have made.

Mr. STONE. The commission itself is authorized to modify the order. I was addressing myself particularly to the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. POMERENE. The court would hear and determine the case upon the record as it came from the commission.

Mr. STONE. I so understand. The apprehension I have and the criticism I make of the Pomerene amendment in the form now proposed is that it would in effect substitute one man, namely, the judge, for the commission composed of five or more men. The judge would take the exact testimony heard by the commission, preserved in the record, and decide whether the order made by the commission was warranted by that testimony and whether it should stand.

In other words, the judge would decide whether he would decide the issues as they were decided by the commission. That would be the substantial and practical effect of the Pomerene amendment with the elimination of the words that he desires to have stricken out.

I am very much in favor of the principles involved in this legislation. There is no doubt that there are in the country evils of the kind intended to be cured by this bill—great evils that do immense harm—and I think within the Constitution the Congress can enact legislation along this line to put an end to or to minimize these evil practices. I am very much afraid, however, that if we are to authorize this commission to hear a case and decide it, and then allow either party to the litigation an appeal to a district judge, to take the record up for his examination, and empower him on that exact record to say that the findings and order of the commission were not warranted, it would very much embarrass the administration of this proposed law. I can not get my mind away from the belief that it is wiser to pursue the practice which has been established and followed in cases originating in the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the so-called Pomerene amendment is agreed to it will very much enlarge the field over which the court would exercise jurisdiction, far beyond the limitations that have been placed upon judicial construction and action by the Supreme Court in cases reviewed by the court originating in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This bill, if enacted into law, will be experimental—too much so, I fear—and I very much wish that the committee and the able Senators who have prepared this amendment could have adjusted the form of their proposal more nearly to the rules of practice and of construction followed in railroad cases originating in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It is because of this fear that I reluctantly hesitate to give my assent to the amendment of my friend from Ohio.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have the honor of being one of the members of the committee who voted in the committee for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and I intend to vote for it here. I think it highly desirable.

While I do not agree with the scathing arraignment of this bill made a while ago by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I believe that what he says makes it all the more imperative that this amendment should be adopted. By the pending bill Congress is about to lay the heavy hand of the Government on the business of the country and to declare how business may be conducted and how it may not, and to say that that shall be done without full right of recourse, by those to be affected, to the courts, is, to my mind, inconceivable. We are undertaking to remedy certain wrongs of which the people complain; but, while the people have their rights, business, too, has its rights. To provide that those rights shall be passed upon and adjudicated without the full right of recourse to the courts is, to my mind, a novel proposition. The right of a man or of a corporation to conduct business in such way as he or it may think proper, provided it does not interfere under the law with the rights of others, is a valuable property right; it is an inherent property right. To enact that that right may be taken away from a man or from a corporation without the full right of recourse to the courts of the country and without a final judgment of the courts is, to my mind, an anomaly. I do not believe that any property right ought to be taken away from anybody, whether individual or corporation, without full right of recourse to the courts of the land.

The proposed trade commission will not be a court; it will not have judicial powers; it will not necessarily conduct its inquiries according to the rules of court procedure or the rules of evidence or any rules of law. There does not need to be a single member of the commission a lawyer; all may be laymen. To provide that these men shall pass on valuable property rights, which may affect the investments of millions of dollars, without full right of recourse by those affected to the courts, to be there passed upon according to law, is, to me, incomprehensible.

We are entering upon a new field, a new scene of action, an unknown sea of legislation that has never before been explored in this country. Some of our Republican friends characterize it as a most reprehensible and obnoxious venture. While I do not agree with them in that, I think we should proceed carefully and allow everybody who may be affected by this new venture in the field of governmental regulation the full right of recourse to our courts. I do not believe that anyone should be denied the right to conduct his business in such manner as he may see fit without the final judgment of the courts upon the question. To do so would be unparalleled, unprecedented. It would infringe natural, inherent rights of men. It would disregard rights which are justly entitled to protection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator whether if we must have a commission that which is proposed by the other House is not preferable to that which is proposed by the Senate? Taking the House bill in its entirety, which was framed after very careful consideration and very careful hearings, is not the commission therein constituted preferable to the one which is proposed by the Senate? In other words, in view of the character and the nature of the duties of the commission as outlined in the House bill as compared with the powers which are imposed upon the commission by the Senate bill, is not the commission provided for by the House bill preferable?

Mr. MYERS. That is altogether a matter of opinion, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, and I want the Senator's opinion upon it.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think so. The House bill does not provide for any prohibition of unfair competition, and that, I think, is one of the most valuable features of the pending bill. It is based on one of the most widespread and extended complaints of the people of this country, and is intended to remedy that; but to say that a board or a commission of five men, not one of whom need be a lawyer or know anything about law, and which may conduct its hearings in a summary manner and not necessarily according to rules of law or court procedure or the rules of evidence, may pass upon and make a final adjudication without the full right of recourse to the courts of the country, upon questions involving valuable property rights, involving the investment of millions of dollars—aye, many millions of dollars, is, I think, unjust to the business interests of the country that are to be subjected to this governmental regulation.

Certain malignant growths have appeared in the commercial life of the country, of which the people justly complain, and we are now applying the surgeon's knife to eliminate them, but I think it ought to be applied very carefully and discreetly and with some power of reviewing the acts of the commission according to the law of the land.

It has been said here, I understand, this morning—I could not be present all of the time—that if the courts are allowed to pass upon the acts of the trade commission it will start a complainant upon an endless career of litigation that it will take years to settle. That may be true, but that is not so bad as saying to citizens of this country, with millions of dollars invested, "You shall not see the inside of a court room. Valuable property rights may be taken away from you upon the decision of five men, but you shall not take the matter into court at all; you shall never see the inside of a court."

I know that long litigation is oppressive and distressing and disastrous; a man does not like to bring a lawsuit if he knows it is going to run the gamut of the courts for years before reaching a final adjudication; but that is not so bad as to have written over the courthouse door, "You shall not enter here; you shall not bring your complaints here at all." I had rather have the prospect of a long-drawn-out court proceeding, with a final adjudication some time, if I had a grievance, than to go to court and see written above the courthouse door, "Thou shalt not enter here," and never get into court at all. That would be far more destructive of the inherent rights of man than to be subjected to some delay by court procedure.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. If what the Senator from Montana says is true, then the amendment pending would be intolerable, but I do not understand that litigants before the commission will be excluded from the courts and that the courthouses will have over their doors, "You can not enter here." There is no provision of that kind, nor is there any effect of that kind.

Moreover, I should like the Senator to answer me this—and I am not saying this in a critical way, in a controversial way, but desire to obtain the judgment of the Senator—if we are going to try the case wholly, in all of its details, on its merits before the district judge, why not go before him in the first instance?

Mr. MYERS. Because this bill provides for a summary disposition of complaints by the commission in a manner much more expeditious and convenient than they could be handled by court procedure, and the probability is that many of the complaints will be finally adjudicated by the commission and will go no further.

Mr. STONE. But the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as amended, provides for a summary hearing before the district judge.

Mr. MYERS. Yes. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio so provides, and wisely so; and there may be other amendments that so provide; but the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is the only one, I believe, which provides for a full right of review as a matter of course and of right by any aggrieved party. It provides for a review by a court a good deal like the review by an appellate court of the proceedings of a trial court.

These are my views of the matter. I regret that I was not able to be present to hear the able argument which I understand was made this morning by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], in whom I have great faith and for whose opinions I have great respect. I regret, too, that in this instance I can not agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has rendered very valuable service in the construction of this bill and for whose opinions I have the greatest respect and whose views always have great weight with me. I have been in accord with him on nearly everything in regard to the bill; but in this particular instance I regret that I can not agree with him. It seems to me that the inherent right of a man to a full court review of his grievances, passed upon by a board, is so strong and sacred that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio best answers the purpose. I think it in accordance with right and justice, that nobody will suffer from it, and that prudence requires its adoption. Let us be careful in the framing of this new legislation, designed to enter upon a new field of governmental regulation fraught with some risk.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the proposed amendment of the Senator from Ohio to his amendment is to be adopted, it seems to me that we will be doing that which is unnecessary; in other words, we will be providing for two trials, receiving the benefit of but one. We will be increasing the expense and trouble of having a trial before the commission, although the decision of that commission may be set at naught by an appeal to the court that will try the case on the record and be deprived of the advantage of having heard the testimony at first hand from the witnesses themselves and thereby enabled to form a more correct conclusion, such as the commission could form by hearing the testimony as it was delivered by the witnesses.

Lawyers all understand that appellate courts can never decide a question of fact nearly as well as the trial court can, for the reason that the trial court has before it the witnesses, and has an opportunity of seeing them when they testify. It can reach a better conclusion as to their intelligence, their interest, their fairness, and disposition to speak truthfully. The appellate court has none of these advantages in weighing the evidence. It sees only the cold, lifeless record, and by this record determines where the truth abides.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion there?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I understand it to be a general rule of law in all jurisdictions where the common law prevails that the appellate court is largely guided as to questions of fact by the conclusions of the court below, and the court in this instance would doubtless follow that rule and not disturb the findings of fact on the evidence before the commission unless there were overwhelming reasons for doing so.

Mr. WHITE. But, Mr. President, the difference is that the record of the trial of the case by the commission is transferred to the court without having any of the safeguards thrown around it that would be thrown around a trial in an ordinary case, where the judge decides the questions of law presented and where the jury decides upon the questions of fact.

I think, really, we had better not create the commission if we are to adopt the amendment which the Senator from Ohio has suggested. It will render the commission absolutely useless; it will embarrass the situation and make more difficult and more tedious and tortuous the route to the end of the litigation. It will necessitate two trials, the first one before the commission composed of gentlemen who are not lawyers and who can not throw around the trial many of the safeguards which lawyers think should be thrown around it. All kinds of testimony may be admitted, illegal as well as legal. Valuable testimony may have been improperly denied by the commission; the court trying the case would not have the benefit of that evidence, but would be bound, as an appellate court is ordinarily bound, to try the case upon the record presented.

I think, Mr. President, to adopt the amendment would be a mistake. If we are going to have a commission we had better give it such authority as will give it life. Give its decisions the weight that will make them effective and cause them to be respected.

I am not, Mr. President, one of those who believe that all the virtue of the country is embodied in the lawyers or the courts, and yet I have as high regard for my profession as any man, and I believe as sincerely as one man can believe in the fairness and integrity of the courts. But they are human; they are just as likely to err as other men. Experience has taught us—we are admonished by it—that courts are not the best triers of facts. That idea was brought to us by our English ancestors when they came to this country.

In England, for centuries before this country was discovered, experience had demonstrated to our ancestors that juries were better triers of facts than judges. The mind of the judge is too technical to properly consider and weigh the common affairs of everyday life.

Mr. President, not only was the idea brought to us by our English ancestors that the judge is not the best trier of facts, but, sir, we have written that principle in the Constitution of the United States. It has been standing there since the foundation of this Government, and no man, so far as I know, has ever yet undertaken to say that it was wrong. No man of intelligence or at all familiar with the administration of justice has so declared.

Not only that, sir, but every one of the 48 States of this Union has written in its organic law that the judge is not the best trier of facts, but, on the contrary, they should be left to a jury. That is the fundamental law of every State in the Union. Are we now to depart from that and say that the decisions and findings of these triers of facts the most intelligent business men that we can find, men trained in business affairs, peculiarly qualified to decide questions of fact, are to be overturned by the decision of a judge, and that judge himself denied the privilege that the commission had of looking into the faces of the witnesses and observing them while testifying?

For that reason, Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I think it is in line with what we are attempting to do. I believe that the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will clog the wheels of progress and prevent the accomplishment of things that are intended to be accomplished by this legislation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that in every jurisdiction in this country the findings of fact of a jury are subject to the review of the appellate court and are sometimes set aside.

Mr. WHITE. Only, sir, when there is no evidence to support the findings. The court can not say how much evidence or what evidence is necessary; the court only has the power to say that there is no evidence.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I submit to the Senator that the courts have said that there must be some substantial evidence, not a mere scintilla of evidence.

Mr. WHITE. That is true; but when I say no evidence I mean "no substantial evidence." But who is to judge of its substantiality; the judges or the juries? The courts can say that there is no evidence; that there is no substantial evidence; that there is nothing beyond a mere scintilla of evidence; but the courts can not undertake to say, and they have never undertaken to say, and they will not say that the verdicts of juries rendered on facts are wrong. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio gives the court the right to say whether the findings of the commission are right or wrong, without regard to the evidence or without regard to the policy involved in the finding.

I am not one of those, Mr. President, who believe that the words "unfair competition" are incomprehensible, nor do I believe, sir, that they are too comprehensive.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to make one more suggestion to the Senator, as he is making a very interesting argument.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. This proposed commission would pass upon questions of law as well as of questions of fact.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; but they pass on questions of fact as well as questions of law, and if the reviewing courts were to pass upon questions of law alone that would not be so bad, but they are to pass on questions of fact as well as law under the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say that, in a large majority, litigation in this country involves questions of law and questions of fact.

Mr. WHITE. That is true; and by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio all of that is transferred from the commission to the court. It opens up a new avenue of danger, which is avoided by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, I am not apprehensive on account of any supposed uncertainty produced by the use of the words "unfair competition." They are not more indefinite than are many expressions encountered by the courts in administering the law. When we use the phrases "reasonably safe," "reasonably sound," or "reasonably adequate," we are using terms quite as indefinite and uncertain as is the phrase "unfair competition," but they have never balked the courts nor held in abeyance the enforcement of law.

In what respect, I ask, is "unfair competition" more indefinite, more uncertain, than the word "negligence"? Yet the courts have worked out a standard; they tell the jury—or, if the case is being tried by the court, the court will adopt the same standard—that "negligence" is that which a reasonably prudent man would or would not do under similar circumstances. "Unfair competition" can be applied by a like standard—that is, what a reasonably intelligent, honest, business man would do under similar circumstances. Take that as your guide, take that as your standard, and you have no more indefinite standard than you have in many other cases. Why, men are indicted, municipalities are tried, for not keeping highways in a reasonably safe condition. What is "reasonably safe"? That which would be so considered by a reasonably prudent man having in view similar circumstances.

I do not think there is anything that we need be afraid, Mr. President. I do not think the country is going to be frightened by shadows that are being cast so numerously at the feet of business men. They understand what is meant by the expression "unfair competition" as they know what is intended by this legislation. It is well known that unfair competition is being indulged in. The question presented to Congress is whether it will prevent selfish, greedy, wicked men from continuing to determine that their practices are legitimate or whether we will leave that question to the judgment and decision of five intelligent, honest, disinterested men, men to be selected by the Government. The question must be decided by one or the other. Which shall it be? I do not believe that Congress is rendered helpless because of its inability to find language sufficiently definite to deal with a situation such as is presented by the greed and avarice of those who are stifling competition in our business world.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended, but I want to say that I think the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is far preferable to that offered by the Senator from Ohio, and I hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in the nature of a substitute, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENYON (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness. Were he present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Mr. President, I am not certain whether my pair is out of the city or not. I have a qualified pair, which is effective only when either my pair or myself is out of the city.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is out of the city.

Mr. REED. Under those circumstances I will withhold my vote; but if permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If the Senator from New York were present, I would vote "yea," believing this amendment to be better than the original.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence I shall withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and his pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. OWEN. I am paired with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 25, not voting, 38, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ashurst	Gronna	Lee, Md.	Simmons
Brady	Hitchcock	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the substitute proposed by the committee, as amended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, on this question I intend to vote for the amendment proposed as a substitute for section 5 as it appears in the bill. Since I spoke upon this subject yesterday I have gone over the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa with care, a thing which I had not done when I discussed it yesterday. I took the statement of the Senator from Iowa as to what he thought would be accomplished by it, and concluded from that statement that the amendment would limit the power of the court to what has been denominated the narrow review. Upon a careful examination of the amendment I doubt very much whether it will accomplish that result, but I am inclined to think that under the terms of the amendment the court will be left free to adopt such rule as it believes it ought to adopt under the provisions of the Constitution without any express legislative limitation.

I voted against it as a substitute, and thereby intended to express my opinion in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which I preferred to this amendment because the amendment of the Senator from Ohio made it perfectly plain that the court was not to be restricted to the narrow review, but was left free to exercise its full judicial powers.

The provisions of the Cummins amendment, so far as that matter is concerned, are as follows:

> Any suit brought by any such person, partnership, or corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district of the residence of the person or of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913 and for other purposes relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

Thus far it has related to the procedure, to the method of bringing the suit, to the number of judges who shall be compelled to hear the case, and so forth. Up to that point it does not establish any rule of evidence.

The next provision is:

> If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission, the person, partnership, or corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from such unfair competition, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity.

That apparently leaves open the question as to the rule which the court itself shall follow in determining a case of this character.

Perhaps the matter is not wholly free from doubt; but there is, at any rate, no express provision in the proposed amendment which undertakes to limit the court to the narrow review. I think, therefore, the court will take hold of the matter when a case is brought before it, and if the court finds that the order which has been issued by the trade commission is of a judicial character it will then exercise its full judicial power over that matter. I do not think any act of Congress could constitutionally restrict the power of the court in that particular. If any action which may be taken by the commission is in the nature of the exercise of legislative power, and if the court should find—a thing which I think it can not find under this bill—that the primary standard has been laid down, and that the legislative act of the commission is within the primary standard, then I think the court would follow the rule which it has followed with reference to proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission. In other words, I think the section may be so construed by the court as to permit the court to adopt either method, in accordance with the character of the order which it may find the commission has adopted.

I utterly dissent from the doctrine which was maintained here this morning by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], that we have any authority to confer upon any body but the courts judicial power, or any part of the judicial power. The authorities which the Senator from Arkansas read followed a well-known line of decisions, to the effect that, so far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, a State may confer judicial power upon a person or body other than the courts, and may confer legislative power upon a body other than the legislature. Whether a State can do that or not would depend on the State constitution. The provisions of the Federal Constitution which divide these three general powers—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive—among these departments are a limitation upon the Government of the United States, and are in no manner a limitation upon the State governments. The State governments may provide for any method of distribution that they please, so long as what they do will not come within the inhibition of some other provision of the Federal Constitution which is directed against the authority of the State to do the particular thing; but under the Constitution of the United States judicial power—and that means all judicial power—is conferred upon the courts.

The Senator from Arkansas says there is nothing in a name; that we do not have to call a man a judge. That may be true; but the Constitution of the United States has also provided that the judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court and such other courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Now, it may be true that Congress may confer judicial power upon a body without calling its members judges; but the Constitution also provides that these judges who exercise the judicial power shall be appointed during good behavior. The members of this commission are not appointed during good behavior. Each member of it is appointed for a period of seven years; and that alone shows that it is not a court in any sense, and that judicial power can not be conferred upon it.

It is true that in the case of the Territorial judges we limited their term of office to four years; but we proceeded, in doing that, under an altogether different power of the Constitution, namely, the power which gives Congress authority to dispose of and make all needful regulations for the Territory and other property of the United States. We may limit the tenure of office of a judge in the District of Columbia, because we govern the District of Columbia under a separate provision of the Constitution; but when we are undertaking to confer the judicial power of the United States upon a body of men we can only confer it upon a body of men who, in substance and effect, constitute a court, whether we call them a court or not. The maintenance of the rule which forbids the commingling of these three, or any two of these three, powers in the same hands is of vital importance.

I want to read into the RECORD a very brief statement from Bondy on The Separation of Governmental Powers, where he quotes from Blackstone and some other writers. I shall read only the quotation from Blackstone.

He says:

> Wherever the right of making and enforcing the law is vested in the same man or one and the same body of men, there can be no public liberty. The magistrate may enact tyrannical laws and execute them in a tyrannical manner, since he is possessed, in his quality of dispenser of justice, with all the power which he as legislator thinks proper to give himself.

As to the necessity of the separation of the judicial from the legislative and executive power, he says:

> Were it joined with the legislative, the life, liberty, and property of the subject would be in the hands of arbitrary judges whose decisions would be regulated only by their opinions, and not by any fundamental principles of law, which, though legislators may depart from, yet judges are bound to observe. Were it joined with the executive, this union might soon be an overbalance of the legislative.

Then I call attention to these words of strength and wisdom which the author of this work himself uses:

> Thus where the legislative and judicial powers are exercised by distinct bodies the general laws are made by one body of men without foreseeing whom they may affect, and when made they must be applied by the other let them affect whom they will. The legislature will then have no private interests to serve, consequently its laws will be suggested by considerations of universal effects and tendencies which always produce impartial and commonly advantageous laws.

So, Mr. President, while I very much prefer the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], because that made certain what to some extent may be left in doubt by this amendment, for the reasons I have stated I intend to vote for it. When it is incorporated into the bill, however, I intend to vote against the bill, because while it will remove one of the objections which I made to the bill, and while the amendments proposed by the Senator from Nevada the other day, which are now pending, and for all of which I shall vote, will remove certain other objections, they do not by any means remove all of the objections which I think justly lie against this measure. They do not reach the question of the violation of the provision of the Constitution against unlawful search and seizure to which I called attention. They do not reach the objections I have made as to the inquisitorial powers of this body of men. They do not reach several of the objections I have heretofore made and which I shall not now undertake to repeat.

I am opposed to the idea of putting into the hands of a mere administrative body of men such far-reaching powers of espionage and control over the private business of this country as this bill seeks to do. I think we might very well define certain improper practices, as, for example, interlocking directorates, intercorporate holdings, and some particular forms of objectionable practice which might be specified.

All those definitions would have to be very carefully guarded, because if we were to inhibit broadly all intercorporate holdings and all interlocking directorates, I think that would result in great hardship in many respects and in injustice in many respects. Some provisions of that kind, carefully drawn and carefully safeguarded, Congress might very well adopt and then primarily turn over to a trade commission, if we undertake to create one, for administration. But when we write into the law this phrase "unfair competition," which the various sponsors of this bill each have a very clear notion about, but with reference to which they unfortunately disagree, we are putting into the statute books of the country a law which, in my judgment, if it be enforced, is bound to result in indescribable confusion to the business interests of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator whether he regards the so-called Cummins amendment as giving a broader court review than section 5 of the bill as reported from the committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Section 5 as reported from the committee gives no review at all. That was the basis of the criticism which I made upon the subject of its conferring judicial power. Let me illustrate——

Mr. NEWLANDS. But is the Senator of the opinion that under section 5 of the bill, as it was reported, the court would have no power whatever over the order? Section 5 as reported provides that the order can only be enforced by the court. What power does the Senator think the court could exercise with reference to such an order?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think under section 5 as originally reported the court would have the power to declare it utterly unconstitutional, and that would be the end of it. The courts are not given the authority to review in any way the findings of this commission. They are simply given the authority, when they find that an order of the commission has been made and that that order has been disobeyed by the corporation, to perfunctorily issue an injunction commanding obedience to the order. That is all there is about it, so far as the original section 5 is concerned. It is that fact that was the basis of the objection which I made, that it undertook to confer judicial power. I can illustrate——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator doubt at all that upon the petition of the commission to the court for an injunction to issue upon its order the court could consider in that case whether the constitutional rights of the corporation were invaded? Does the Senator doubt that the court in that case could consider the question as to whether the order was within the authority conferred by the statute? Does the Senator doubt that the court in that case could determine whether or not the facts upon which the order was based constituted the offense of unfair competition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I doubt all those things. The court would have before it no case which presented those questions, because upon examining the statute which was the basis of the order that they were called upon to review they would find that that statute was void, and that would be the end of it. Of course, if a statute was passed which is unconstitutional and therefore utterly void, the proceedings under the void statute would not present a case which the courts could review. The only thing the courts could do and should do—and I am quite sure in my own mind that they would do—would be to declare that section 5 was entirely outside of the constitutional authority of Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from Utah that my impression is that the friends of the amendment known as the Cummins amendment, which has just been adopted, do not think that under it the court could look at the facts and say whether the facts would constitute the offense.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I know that is their position. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa had said in so many words that the court was in its review confined to determining, first, whether or not the commission has acted within its power, and whether or not its action is in conformity to the Constitution, I would unhesitatingly have voted against the amendment. I am going to vote for it, because I think after a careful examination of it the amendment will not be construed by the courts as some of the proponents for it have construed it. I may be mistaken about that, but I have tried to read it with some care, and I think I am right.

But I was going to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the distinction between these powers that I am speaking about. Under the interstate-commerce act it is true there are two classes of powers that are conferred upon the commission. One is to inquire as to whether or not given rates are reasonable, whether given practices are fair, and then not to pass judgment against the railroad company guilty of extorting unreasonable rates or of indulging in unfair practices, not to impose a penalty, not to issue an injunction, but to fix a rate for the future, to lay down a course of conduct for the future, both of which are in essence legislative acts. As to that character of acts, the court will not review the facts upon which the action of the commission was taken any more than the courts would review the facts which might have moved the Congress of the United States in taking similar action.

A State legislature, for example, investigates the railroad situation and adopts a law which requires a railroad company to charge only 2 cents a mile for passengers. That is a legislative act. The courts would review that action in order to determine whether or not the charge which they have allowed the railroad company to make is so low as to be confiscatory and therefore in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, but they will not inquire as to the evidence upon which the legislature acted in passing the law.

Now, it is altogether different when we come to the quasi judicial functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Let me call the Senator's attention to section 16, which is—

That if after hearing on a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, the commission shall determine that any party complainant is entitled to an award of damages under the provisions of this act for a violation thereof, the commission shall make an order directing the carrier to pay to the complainant the sum to which he is entitled on or before a day named.

Now, mark:

If a carrier does not comply with an order for the payment of money within the time limit in such order, the complainant, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may file in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which he resides or in which is located the principal operating office of the carrier, or through which the road of the carrier runs, or in any State court of general jurisdiction having jurisdiction of the parties, a petition setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages, and the order of the commission in the premises. Such suit in the circuit court of the United States shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suit the findings and order of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the petitioner shall not be liable for costs in the circuit court nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal.

The effect of that is simply to make the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I said the other day, a sort of referee to investigate the facts and making a finding upon them, or a so-called order upon them, which the carrier is at perfect liberty to disregard or to follow.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] seemed to find some fault this morning with my statement that it would be simply in the nature of good advice. Yet, after all, that is all it is. It is not a judgment upon which execution shall issue or which can be enforced as such. It is simply good advice to the carrier to the effect that after investigating this subject it is our opinion that you owe these complainants some money, and we think you ought to pay it, but if the common carrier does not choose to follow that advice the whole matter is open to the courts.

I think if the words "unfair competition" have any legal meaning and are to be confined to their legal meaning, what this commission does when it inquires whether or not somebody has violated this section 5 is similar to what the Interstate Commerce Commission does when they investigate the question of a money claim. When the commission issues an order upon that it simply issues a piece of advice to the corporation involved, saying, in substance and effect, we think you have violated this law and you had better cease the practice; and if the corporation does not see fit to do that under this proposed amendment the case goes to the courts. Without any amendment the whole thing stops there, except that you have attempted to put into your provision a perfectly abortive thing, namely, a direction to the court to enforce the order of the commission, without any inquiry as to the facts upon which it was originally based.

Mr. President, I discussed that question at some length on yesterday and on preceding days. I did not intend to go over it again. For reasons I have given, I intend to vote for the amendment, and then I intend to vote against the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make a statement. In view of the fact that the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the committee, accepted the so-called Pomerene amendment as a part of the committee amendment, it became the text of the bill. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, therefore, was to strike out and insert. It requires no additional concurrence, the affirmative votes on that having the effect of striking out from the committee report the Pomerene amendment accepted by the chairman, and the Cummins amendment is now a part of the text of the bill.

There is another statement the Chair desires to make. On yesterday the Chair was under the impression that the adoption of the Cummins amendment would have the effect of eliminating, if that amendment should be adopted, the proviso prohibiting the admittance of the order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of section 5 as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts. An inspection of the amendment shows that it was not intended to interfere with the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as I understand the Chair, he holds that when any committee, after it has reported a bill to the Senate and which was in the possession of the Senate, had agreed to recommend that the report of the committee to the Senate should be amended in a certain way, thereby the bill pending in the Senate becomes amended without any action by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposer of an amendment may modify it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The amendment is a committee report, and while I agree that an individual Senator may modify any amendment that he proposes——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada said the matter had been presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and the request submitted by him was on behalf of that committee. The Chair presumes that the committee has the same control over its amendments that an individual Senator would have over his own amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may be allowed to state coherently my notion about the matter, it is this: The committee reported the House bill to the Senate recommending that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and that certain matter printed in italics be inserted in lieu thereof. That is the measure before the Senate. That was done on June 13. The other day, within three days certainly, the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or a quorum, met and agreed to report to the Senate a proposed amendment to what they had previously reported. It seems to me that the mere subsequent report of a committee of a proposition to amend what they had previously reported should be amended on the floor of the Senate; that the committee can not ipso facto act for the Senate as though it was the action of the Senate; that it must be acted upon as any other committee amendment would be acted upon. When the committee has reported, it has lost jurisdiction or control of what it has reported, and it must make recommendations as to changes which it may desire to have made.

What the committee had originally reported June 13 was merely a recommendation to the Senate that the House text should be amended as indicated. Having done that, it takes me by surprise to have it asserted that the committee may subsequently recommend that what they have already recommended should be modified, and that that modification shall be made without the consent of the Senate or any action by the Senate. That in brief is my point.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I rose to a parliamentary inquiry some time ago. In my inquiry at that time I asked the Chair if the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio had been acted upon by the Senate and the Chair——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made the text of the committee amendment by the action of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The committee proposed to amend its amendment under the right given to that committee or to any individual Senator to modify an amendment. That is the ruling made yesterday, and it was not excepted to.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the chairman of the committee had a perfect right to perfect his amendment, but in perfecting the amendment it must be agreed to by the Senate.

That is the parliamentary inquiry to which I rose before, as to whether it had been acted upon by the Senate. If it had been acted upon by the Senate then the amendment of the Senator from Iowa was simply an amendment to strike out and insert, but if it had not been acted upon by the Senate, then it was an amendment in the second degree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Pomerene amendment was made a part of the proposal of the committee. But that is a moot question at this time. The Senator from Nevada proposes certain amendments to the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that we have finally acted upon the Cummins amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have, for this reason: The Pomerene amendment was made the text of the committee report by the withdrawal of the original section 5 and by the adoption by the committee of the Pomerene amendment. The parliamentary attitude of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa was to stike out the so-called Pomerene amendment, it having been made a part of the text of the bill, and to insert the amendment offered by him. That has been done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be that it is only a moot question, but I think it is an important question. I had supposed that when a committee had reported to the Senate, the report was in the possession of the Senate and it was for the Senate to perfect the matter which had been reported by the committee.

I am not going, of course, to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but I simply want it recorded in the RECORD that I protest against it, and I do not want it to serve as a precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be noted. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nevada proposed certain amendments yesterday. The clerks say that they have not been noted as having been proposed by the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, simply to make the ruling of the Chair perfectly plain, and for my own information of the parliamentary procedure, do I understand that it is the ruling of the Chair that the committee having made a report upon a bill to the Senate the committee can thereafter at any time before the Senate acts upon the bill change the text of the reported amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair proceeded under this rule:

> Any motion or resolution may be withdrawn or modified by the mover at any time before a decision, amendment, or ordering of the yeas and nays, except a motion to reconsider, which shall not be withdrawn without leave.

The Senator from Nevada, in charge of the bill on behalf of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, modified the amendment reported by the committee by striking out certain matter and inserting other matter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The question in my mind right now is, Did the Senator from Nevada ask permission of the Senate to do that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was done yesterday without any objection, and we can not go back of that action at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask whether it is in order now to offer any amendment to section 5, the Cummins amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment of that nature is not in order as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Chair rules that it will not be in order until we get the bill into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so rules.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer an amendment on page 17, line 22. After the word "engaged" I move to strike out the words "or concerning its relation to any individual, association, or partnership" and substitute the words "relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will indicate the page and line so that the clerks may get the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Upon page 17, line 22, after the word "engaged."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the printed amendments proposed by the Senator from Nevada an amendment appears that, on page 17, line 9, after the word "commerce," to strike out the words "and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments now offered by the Senator from Nevada have been printed, and if he will send them to the desk and let them be read it will be much more easy to grasp what is being done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to add some words to that amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Before we get away from this matter, I desire to reserve the right to have a separate vote in the Senate, when the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole, upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] which was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Notice will be taken of the suggestion of the Senator from Montana. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Nevada that he send his amendments to the desk that they may be reported.

The SECRETARY. The Senate has already agreed to the amendment on page 17, line 9, to insert after the word "commerce" the words "relating to or in anyway affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Has that already been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The recollection of the Chair is otherwise. It has been proposed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask whether that amendment struck out the words "and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is some confusion about the record, and the confusion will be increased unless the Senator reduces his amendments to writing and sends them to the desk so that they may be presented in the regular way. The Chair can not entertain an amendment unless the Senator conforms to the rule of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, on page 17, line 9, after the word "commerce," I move to strike out the comma and the words "and its relations to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the proposed committee amendment, lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the words "and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none. Are there further amendments to be proposed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 17, line 22, after the word "engaged," I move to strike out the words "or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, in the committee amendment, lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 20, line 11, after the words "United States," I move to strike out the words "and also to investigate whether American exporters have combined with each other or with foreign producers or dealers to control prices abroad."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed committee amendment, page 20, beginning with line 11, after the words "United States" and the comma, strike out the words "and also to investigate whether American exporters have combined with each other or with foreign producers or dealers to control prices abroad."

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator why he proposes to strike out that clause.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The reason for striking out that clause is because the power of investigation is given in the previous subdivision. This provision is as to the investigation of trade practices abroad.

Mr. LANE. The bill already provides for it and there is no need of it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 22——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Senator from Nevada if these are committee amendments?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Under the ruling of the Chair they have become parts of the text without the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 22, line 21, after the word "commerce," I move to insert the words "with the intent to prevent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22 in the proposed amendment of the committee, line 21, after the word "commerce" and the comma, insert the words "with the intent to prevent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In the same line, after the word "production" I move to insert the word "thereof."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the same line—line 21—page 22, after the word "production" insert the word "thereof."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In the same line after the word "thereof," just inserted, I move to strike out the words "of which the commission may require under this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 21 and 22, page 22, strike out the words "of which the commission may require under this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a few days ago I offered an amendment to be known as section 6, relating to a regulation prohibiting one corporation from holding or owning the stock of another, the two being engaged in like business. I debated the matter to some extent and we had a vote upon it and the amendment was rejected. I think largely because the same subject was dealt with in the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

It was then stated—and, I think, with a good deal of force—that whatever changes should be made in the report of the Judiciary Committee ought to be made through amendments when that bill is before the Senate for consideration. I think that all these regulations touching holding companies and interlocking directorates that are to be worked out through the commission should be in this bill; but I appreciate the difficulty and the embarrassment of accomplishing that end at this time.

I have two amendments in my hand, one touching what are known as holding companies, the other relative to interlocking directorates. I desire to offer these amendments, in their order, for I can not satisfy myself without indicating in this manner how I think this bill should be composed; but I do not intend to either argue them or to ask a roll call upon them. I accept the decision of the Senate made the other day with regard to a similar amendment relating to intercorporate stockholding as indicative of its desire to deal with those subjects in the Clayton bill. I present these amendments simply to show what I think the bill ought to contain. I offer the amendment I send to the desk as section 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the amendment may not be read. It is precisely in the procedure it provides like the amendment that has been substituted for the committee amendment with regard to unfair competition. I think we could save time if we could consent that the amendment should not be further read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 7. It shall be unlawful for any corporation to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control of two or more corporations engaged in commerce, the business of which latter corporations is naturally, and by reason of character and location, competitive.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to forbid and prevent such unlawful conditions in commerce in the manner following, to wit:

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has acquired, or is owning, holding, or controlling, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control of two or more corporations engaged in commerce, and that the business of the two or more corporations is naturally, and by reason of character and location, competitive, it shall issue and serve upon such corporation a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint. If upon such hearing the commission shall find that the corporation named in the complaint has acquired, or is owning, holding, or controlling the capital stock or other share capital, or other means of control or participation in the control of two or more corporations engaged in commerce and contrary to the provisions of this section, it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the corporation an order requiring that within a reasonable time, to be stated in said order, the corporation shall bring itself into conformity with the law by ceasing to acquire, own, or control the whole or any part of the capital stock or other means of control or participation in the control of such other corporations so engaged in commerce.

The commission may at any time set aside, in whole or in part, or modify its findings or order so entered or made.

Any suit brought by any corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the corporation has its principal office or place of business, and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission the corporation against which the order is made shall not have complied therewith, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court of the United States in the district wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity; all the provisions of the law relating to appeals and advancement for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside suits brought in the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply to suits brought under this section: Provided, That this section shall not apply to corporations acquiring, owning, and holding capital stock or other share capital, solely for investment, and not using same in bringing about or in attempting to bring about a common control of the corporations whose stock or other share capital it owns and holds; nor shall it apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers; nor shall it be construed to prevent the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of the immediate and lawful business of the principal corporation: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect, nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I now offer as section 8 an amendment relating to interlocking directorates, and ask that the same consent with regard to reading the part of the amendment relative to the procedure prescribed in the amendment be given. I ask that there be read only the substantive part of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 8. It shall be unlawful for any person to be at the same time a member of the board of directors or other managing board, or an officer of two or more corporations, either of which is engaged in commerce, the business of which corporations is naturally and by reason of character and location competitive.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to forbid and prevent such unlawful conditions in commerce in the manner following, to wit: Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any person is at the same time a member of the board of directors or other managing board, or an officer of two or more corporations, the business of which is competitive, as hereinbefore set forth, it shall issue and serve upon such person and the corporation with which he is so connected a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The person so complained of and the said corporation shall have the right to appear at the time and place so fixed and show cause why an order should not be issued by the commission requiring such person or persons to cease and desist from being at the same time a member of such boards or from being at the same time an officer of such corporation. If, upon such hearing, the commission shall find that any such person is a member of the boards or an officer of such corporations and that the business of said corporations is a competitive business as herein defined, it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue an order requiring that within a reasonable time, to be stated in said order, that such person shall bring himself into conformity with the law by ceasing to be at the same time a member of the boards or an officer of such competitive corporations.

The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order entered or made by it under this section.

In any suit brought by any such person to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in the district court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the said person resides, and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission the person against whom it is directed fails to comply therewith, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in the district court of the United States in the judicial district wherein such person resides to enforce its said order; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience to any such order according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity. All the provisions of the law relating to appeals and advancement for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply to suits brought under this section: Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect, nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest that when we reach the consideration of the Clayton bill, or that part of it dealing with intercorporate stockholding and holding companies and interlocking directorates, that I intend again to offer these amendments as substitutes for those portions of the Judiciary Committee bill; but I do not at this time ask for a roll call upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed amendment to be inserted at the end of section 5. I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss the amendment, nor shall I take the time of the Senate to ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon it. I will simply say that it is a copy of the provision contained in the Sherman antitrust law, giving an aggrieved party the right of action.

While I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the bill we are now considering, if enacted, will be a public law and should be enforced for the public, at the same time I see no reason why the party who has been injured by an unlawful act should not have a right to recover. I also believe that putting this remedy in the hands of the aggrieved party will be a very strong incentive to the observance of and obedience to the law by those against whom the law is directed as a regulating and controlling force.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is what I understand it to be, I very much hope that he will ask for a vote upon it, and I believe it will be adopted.

Mr. STONE. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, however—and I will make the suggestion to the Senator—that the amendment ought to be a separate section, just as it is in the antitrust law. If I have correctly understood the Senator, he now proposes to give to an aggrieved party a right of action, with the recovery of treble damages. I think such a provision ought to be a part of this bill. I do not believe anybody will oppose it; but it should be a separate section.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, Mr. President, I will offer the amendment for the purpose of the RECORD at this time as section 5½, the sections to be properly numbered when the bill is completed. Of course, I have no objection and think myself it would be well to make this amendment a separate section. The amendment reads:

SEC. —. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or may be found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator from Minnesota insist upon the phrase "threefold the damages"? Does not the Senator think that actual damages incurred would be sufficient in these new cases of unfair competition?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not care particularly. I said at the outset that I simply copied this amendment from the antitrust law. I believe that if we are going to place the administration of this law in the hands of the commission, we can not attach to the law too many forces that will tend to its observance and its execution and administration. I believe that the possibility of a threefold recovery would be a strong factor in making men cautious in regard to the violation of the proposed law. At the same time, I have no pride of opinion in the matter, if the Senate generally thinks the damages should be reduced to twofold, or I would rather even see no multiplication of damages than not to have the amendment adopted at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am prepared on behalf of the committee to accept the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator desires, however, he can submit an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am prepared to accept the amendment if the Senator will strike out the word "threefold." I think it is unwise at this stage of the proceeding with reference to this form of legislation by law to inflict upon every offender threefold the damages that are actually suffered by the complainant. I should much prefer that such action should take place hereafter, as the result of the investigation and the experience and the recommendation of the commission, if they should deem it advisable. It seems to me that we ought to move along rather cautiously in the early stages of this legislation. I shall be prepared to accept the amendment if the Senator will confine it to actual damages.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is not the sums that will be recovered, but it is the adoption of such an amendment as a factor in preventing the violation of this law, which is important. Personally I believe that the damages had better be threefold. The Senator from Nevada or any other Senator, of course, can propose to amend the amendment by making the damages twofold.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he contemplates that this action may be brought only after the commission has determined that an act constitutes unfair competition, or can any person go into court in the first instance and test the question whether it constitutes unfair competition by an action without reference to the commission?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that is going to depend upon whether, in the last analysis, the courts are going to hold that we have delegated to this commission the legislative function of declaring what is and what is not the law. If they hold that we have, then, of course, there can be no recovery, because there is nothing forbidden until the commission has declared that a given act is in violation of the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken. We declare in this bill that "unfair competition is unlawful," and whenever we make a public declaration that an act is unlawful, if I understand the law correctly, that of itself gives a right of action to a person who is injured by the unlawful act. Even though there was not a single word more in the statute, the right of action follows the declaration that the thing done is unlawful.

Having declared that unfair competition is unlawful, can I go into court under the amendment which the Senator offers and proceed on my own volition to bring an action against my competitor and obtain from him treble damages for an act of unfair competition of the unlawful character of which he knows nothing by any form of definition?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I repeat my answer, that if this is the delegation of legislative authority, then, while we say that unfair competition is unlawful, it remains for the commission to declare what is unfair competition. If, on the other hand, this bill can be construed as a declaration by Congress, for instance, that local underselling, with all the accessories, which I will not enumerate, is unfair competition without any declaration of the commission, then, of course, a party injured by local underselling, in the terminology that would be involved in the technical description of that act, can proceed to seek recovery.

If the Senator from North Dakota is correct, that we have defined and declared by our act that local underselling is an offense, then the man who engages in local underselling knows that he is committing an offense, because he knows he is violating the statute. I undertake to say that no man living knows whether we have declared that practice an offense or whether we have not. It will have to be determined by the courts whether we have delegated that authority to the commission or whether Congress, by its own declaration that unfair competition is unlawful, has made underselling a prohibited transaction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, if no man on earth can know whether he is disobeying the law or not until some time in the future, when some commission finds out and tells him that he is disobeying the law, does not the Senator think that mulcting him in treble damages is a little bit harsh?

Mr. CLAPP. No; because he can not be mulcted in treble damages until the commission has declared the particular act unlawful.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not according to the Senator's amendment. His amendment does not provide that after the commission has determined that a certain act is unlawful, then any person injured by a continuance of that act may have treble damages.

Mr. CLAPP. But my amendment provides that any person who shall suffer by reason of any act forbidden or made unlawful by this act may sue and recover treble damages.

I repeat—and I can not make it any plainer—that if it remains for the commission first to say whether local underselling—and I use that as a familiar illustration—is forbidden, then local underselling is not forbidden until the commission has so declared; and the same thing would apply to any other practice. It is in analogy with the antitrust law. There is no suggestion in the provision relating to the recovery of damages in the Sherman Act that such damages may be recovered after an act has been declared illegal. I have copied verbatim the language found in the Sherman antitrust law, and I leave the matter there.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, the jumble in which we find ourselves plunged in this legislation all comes from the fact that we do not dare to define what we mean by "unfair competition." Now it is proposed to punish an individual for an offense when no one will dare to say what that offense is or will attempt to define it. It is proposed to subject him to a suit for treble damages if at some time in the future five men to whom Congress has given the legislative authority—which it has no right to give—determine that an act he has committed constitutes the offense. If we are granting any authority at all in the matter of determining what that offense is, it must be legislative authority pure and simple. No standard is fixed, and certainly the mere broad assertion of unfairness does not furnish a standard under which a man ought to be punished.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I confess there is some force in the suggestion of legislative chaos, not due, however, in my judgment, to any cowardice in the matter of furnishing definitions, but because we have not the courage to assert our independence as a legislative body and take our own time in calm deliberation in the preparation of important legislation. That is why we find ourselves confronted with these apparent inconsistencies.

But for myself—and I am only speaking now for myself—I do not believe, under this bill, if it passes in its present form, that any crime is committed until the commission declares a specific act is within the prohibition of the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not that legislative authority?

Mr. CLAPP. Unquestionably.

Mr. McCUMBER Can we grant such authority?

Mr. CLAPP. Ten years ago, even five years ago, not a Member of this body could have been brought to contemplate the vesting of such authority in a board or a commission, but we have progressed; the courts have advanced along this line, and I am inclined to think—I am quite certain, or as certain as a man can be in such a matter—that when this bill reaches the courts the courts will hold that we have not exceeded our authority in delegating this power to the commission.

In the bill providing for the opening of the Panama Canal we used quite as broad language as this. We provided that certain restrictions were to be suspended so long as the Interstate Commerce Commission felt that the suspension of those limitations was for the public good and did not materially interfere with competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. So far, Mr. President, there has been no declaration in the bill the effect of which would punish the individual until this commission itself has determined what the offense is and whether the offense has been committed.

Mr. CLAPP. Clearly the amendment does not do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. And after that nothing can be done except to enjoin the individual from committing offenses of like character; but now it is proposed to go a step further. If this amendment is incorporated in the bill, you immediately provide for the punishment of an offense of which the offender can know nothing, at least until some quasi legislative body has passed judgment upon the question whether or not he has a right to do a particular thing.

I think the Senator from Minnesota entirely agrees with me that if two competitors are seeking business and one of them advertises in glowing terms or makes claims for his goods that are not founded upon exact facts, he is undoubtedly guilty of some kind or in some degree of unfair competition; and yet I do not believe that the Senator from Minnesota would include that within the terms of this bill as unfair competition, over which the proposed trade commission would be given jurisdiction. I confess I think they probably would have jurisdiction over it unless the term "unfair competition" is defined.

If the one great object to be sought is the prevention of competition by unfair methods, then I can see no reason on earth why a definition can not be formulated which will bring the acts prohibited clearly within the understanding of all, so that the Senator from Minnesota or I or any other person in business would be able to know beforehand whether our actions were in the end calculated to destroy competition and whether we were guilty of a wrong.

I say that the very argument which the Senator is making in behalf of the right of the aggrieved party to recover treble damages emphasizes the necessity for a definition that will make clear to business men exactly what the law means. I believe I have as comprehensive an idea of what constitutes "unfairness" as have average business men, and yet I confess I do not know what the term "unfair competition" means; and, inasmuch as there are no two Senators who agree as to what that expression does mean, there can not be more than 1 out of the 96 of us who is correct. If that be true, it does seem to me, in all candor, that we ought not to impose such a law upon the public without providing any definition or any guide to recommend itself to their judgment. To follow the broad provision in regard to "unfair competition" with an enactment proposing to inflict treble damages upon the person who is guilty of it appears to me to be going very far. I agree with the Senator that it is all right to fix a penalty of treble damages, provided you will let the person know beforehand what the offense is which renders him liable to such damages.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I would have no quarrel with the Senator from North Dakota if he were to attempt to define those acts which would be included within the expression "unfair competition."

Personally, I think it is a very plain designation, as plain as "restraint of trade" or "reasonable rate." At the same time, believing, as I always have, in making laws just as plain as they can be framed, I should be glad to see this law framed in a way that would place it beyond any question.

One thing is certain, however, we are not going to be able to do that. This bill is going to pass substantially in its present form. I have an amendment pending which first prohibits unfair competition and then leaves it directly to the courts, without the intervention of any commission, but I know that the amendment has no more chance of being adopted than an ordinary snowball in the realm of torture would have of developing into an avalanche. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, does not the Senator believe that when we declare that unfair competition is unlawful, and follow that up with a declaration that any person who is injured by that unfair competition may proceed in court to collect from the person injuring him treble damages, he can go immediately into court under that provision, without waiting until some commission has determined it?

If "unfair competition" is a sufficient definition so that the court itself can say that it has a general meaning in the law which the public understands, then it seems to me the Senator must agree with me that the right would follow to go into court immediately, under his amendment, to secure his rights, and that the question as to whether or not there has been unfair competition can be tested in that way.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, my amendment does not change the law itself or the terms of the bill as now framed. Either from the moment this bill is signed local underselling, for instance, becomes a forbidden act, or it does not become forbidden until the commission forbids it. I simply take the law as I find it, and give to this proposed amendment of mine the same relation to the law which everything else sustains to it. If those engaged in business can not tell until the commission has told them what is an offense, then no action can be sustained here until the commission has told them. If, on the other hand, they are bound by the terms of this law, then, knowing this to be the law, and under the rule that men must know the law, they will have no difficulty in avoiding violations of the law. My amendment is not designed so much as a penalty, so much as a recovery, as it is that, standing there, it may be a factor in deterring men from violating the law.

So far as the definition is concerned, as I said before, I should be glad to see "unfair competition" more plainly defined, if it can be. So far as the right of recovery is concerned, while I have taken it as threefold from the Sherman antitrust law, and shall submit it as threefold, of course it is in the power of the Senate to modify that as it sees fit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have it here, and was just about to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Secretary read it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall be very glad to have that done.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add in the bill a new section, to be known as section 6, and subsequent sections to be numbered:

SEC. 6. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or may be found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it appears, from the proposed amendment, that—

Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in the district court of the United States—

And recover treble damages.

The language is—

Who shall be injured * * * by * * * anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act.

Section 5 of the act says:

Unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

So, if this amendment is adopted, clearly any person who is injured by unfair competition in commerce may go to the court, independently of any commission, and recover treble damages.

The fact that the act provides, in section 5, that whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation or person—now that the Cummins amendment has been agreed to—is guilty of unfair competition, the commission shall order it to cease, is not an exclusive remedy. This would clearly give an independent remedy to any person against any other person or corporation who has committed any act of unfair competition.

Of course, as has been repeatedly pointed out here, there is at present something that the courts issue injunctions against as unfair competition, and in equity I suppose they would compensate the man who has been injured by it; but I assume that at present, under existing law, the compensation is not treble. If this amendment is adopted it would, in my judgment, give treble damages as compensation to anybody against whom the courts shall say an act of unfair competition has been committed, and who has been injured thereby.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, as I said before, this amendment is not original with me. I copied it out of the Sherman antitrust law, and precisely the same provision is in the Clayton bill, I think, as reported.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not claiming that it is original with the Senator, Mr. President. I understand that it is taken from the Sherman law and that it was intended to give that remedy to a party who had been injured by a restraint of trade or an attempt to monopolize under that statute. My object here is simply to point out, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], that no judgment of the commission would be necessary for the individual to go right into court, as a personal right conferred by this amendment, and conduct his own litigation and get the judgment of the court. There would, of course, arise at once, as a judicial question—where, in my opinion, it should be determined—whether "unfair competition," as used in this statute, means anything other than the unfair competition which is now prohibited by courts of equity upon application.

There is one suggestion which, while I am on the floor, I will offer for what it may be worth. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has expressed repeatedly during the discussion of this matter his confidence that the parties who are prohibited by the commission from continuing in the methods which the commission might think were unfair would submit to the commission's decree and that there would be very few appeals. If this amendment is adopted it will compel every corporation, at least, whose practices have been so extensive as to injure a large number of people, to fight to the death every order that the commission may make. They will have to appeal every case, even if they are willing to abandon the practice when it is called to their attention, and go to a court to have it reversed, and use every means in their power to have it reversed, or else they will be liable in threefold damages to everybody in the country that they may have injured. It would do more than anything else to absolutely neutralize any beneficial result that the Senator from Nevada and the other friends of the bill think will flow from it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I do not believe in the principle of assessing threefold damages. If we are to apply it to unfair competition, why should we not apply it to all cases of tort? Why should we not declare by law that in every case of tort where injury is done and damage is proved the judgment should be entered up for three times the amount? Why should we not in every action for deceit, every action for fraud, every action for personal injury, provide by law that a judgment shall be entered up for three times the damages actually sustained?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator, of course, is aware that in a great many States, for malicious trespass, willful trespass, there follows recovery of three times the amount of the injury. More than that, this is a public offense; and a penalty may well attach as it would attach to any other public offense.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not believe that practice is a general practice, and whether it be or not I do not believe it is to be extended. Certain penalties can be properly attached in a case, such as infliction of the expenses of the suit, the attorney's fee, and so forth; but when it comes to assessing three times the actual damages suffered, it outrages every man's sense of justice.

We are entering now upon a new field of inquiry as to what constitutes unfair competition. This commission, and ultimately the courts, will be called upon to make nice distinctions with reference to this matter for the purpose of determining what set of facts and circumstances constitute unfair competition. Here we hold this sword of Damocles above every business man in the country, and either compel him to abandon a practice which perhaps he thinks is right, or to pursue litigation to the bitter end, when we want through this instrumentality not to punish, but to secure higher standards of conduct, by rules that will be laid down by this commission and sustained by the court, and which will have an educational effect upon the commerce of the country.

There is another reason why I am opposed to such amendments as this. I am opposed to loading down this bill. The country now is in an embarrassed industrial condition, accentuated by conditions that are world-wide. I would not add a single ounce to the weight the business men throughout the country are carrying now. I do not want to see this bill accepted by the business community as carrying terror and destruction. I hope they will feel, as I feel, that it will be an instrumentality of beneficence.

It was for that reason that we confined the operation of the unfair-competition clause, so far as the powers of this commission were concerned, to corporations, and exempted associations of individuals, simply because we realized that the practices that are complained of are largely the practices of consolidated wealth in the shape of corporations; that it was the war of the giants against the pygmies with reference to practices that were prejudicial to good business morals, and since we realized that any movement of this kind would have some disturbing effect upon the business of the country we wanted to confine it to as small an area as possible. We knew that the effect of this legislation would be exaggerated, and that every effort would be made to impress the average business man of the country with the idea that this law meant inconvenience and distress and disturbance to him. Realizing that the average business man of the country is an honest man, and that few of the dangers of unfair competition come from individuals and firms that are engaged in business, and that almost all of them come from corporate organizations, we determined to apply the powers of this act only to corporations, less than 300,000 in all, of which probably not one-third are engaged in interstate commerce, instead of extending it so as to embrace millions of business men who would suffer under exaggerated apprehension regarding the effect of this bill upon their business.

For this reason I oppose any enlargement of the scope of the bill. It is true that we have recently adopted an amendment extending the operations of section 5 to firms, associations, and individuals, and beyond the corporations. I regret that that amendment has been adopted. I hope it will be corrected in the Senate. I want to see this bill confined, as far as possible, to the area of actual business degeneracy.

Mr. President, I hope the friends of this bill will not permit it to be loaded down. This whole matter will go through an evolutionary process, just as the control of railroads went through an evolutionary process. I think it probably would have been a great mistake to have given the railroad commission at the very start the large powers which it now enjoys. I very much fear it would have exercised them unwisely, or in such a way as probably to have resulted in the speedy repeal of the act. I have seen many bills, whose authors were animated by the highest spirit of reform, repealed because of too aggressive enforcement of the reform sought to be obtained. I believe this commission should go through the same evolutionary process and gradual advance that the Interstate Commerce Commission has gone through, and that it will be better for the commission and better for the business of the country if we do not enlarge too extensively the area of its operations or make its powers too severe.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, after several weeks of discussion and committee activity we now reach the point where it is suggested that we shall play fast and loose with conditions that the administration, those out of the administration, and the country generally, have recognized call for some remedy.

One of two things is absolutely certain: Either there are men and corporations in this country engaged in unfair competition which should be forbidden and prevented, or else there are not; one or the other.

To pass a law against unfair competition is no more to brand everybody as prone to unfair competition than, in the creation of a new State, the passage of a law against murder would be branding all the inhabitants of the State as murderers. This law simply reaches those who are prone to violate it. It simply reaches those who, if unrestrained, will continue unfair competition. There is no halfway ground upon that proposition.

It is about time to explode this idea that we can bring in these trust magnates and convert them to industrial and commercial altruism. Either we should legislate against that spirit and that course or we ought to stop this agitation and this debate.

The existence of the Sherman antitrust law, the presence in this Chamber of the Clayton bill, the incoming of the bill to regulate the issue of securities, the presence of this bill in the Senate, all stand as evidence that in public opinion and in the judgment of this body there is a spirit in this country that should be regulated and controlled; and there is no way to regulate and control that force so effectively as not to hang a sword above these people, but to stand at the gateway of commercial integrity with a flaming sword, that they may be deterred from violating the law in its letter and in its spirit.

If it is worth while to legislate against any individual or corporation, if they actually need restraining, then we should bring to our aid everything that will make that attempted restraint effective and of some force and some value. This law does not affect the man who is not violating it. This law is no threat hanging over the head of the honest business man who does not want to resort to unfair practices to crush out his smaller and weaker competitor; and the same reason exists for a penalty here to deter violation of the law that exists for passing the law prohibiting these things that are sought to be prohibited.

If it is thought that the penalty is too severe, as I said before, that is a matter for the Senate to deal with. In case the Senate is in favor of the amendment at all, it can deal with it by an amendment to the amendment.

When I offered this amendment I had not thought, and at that time disclaimed a purpose, to call for the yeas and nays; but in view of the trend which this discussion has taken I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I fear the Senator from Minnesota, who has offered this amendment, coming as it does from the antitrust act, has overlooked the very important fact that the organization of a conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade or the establishment of a monopoly denounced by the Sherman antitrust law is made criminal, and heavy penalties are imposed by the act upon anyone who shall be guilty of a violation of it. It is quite consistent with legislation with which we are all familiar to give double or treble damages to anyone suffering injuries by reason of an act denounced by the statute as criminal.

The Senator has referred to the case of malicious mischief. That is a very familiar one. That is to say, when one destroys the property of another out of malice, he is ordinarily subjected to a criminal prosecution; and, if it is established, this is imposed by way of a penalty. It is a further penalty imposed upon the defendant who commits a crime. Likewise, there are other circumstances and conditions where the law frequently imposes double or treble damages. They all embrace a case that is ordinarily denounced by the statute as criminal or one that is declared to involve a high degree of moral turpitude. It is of the same character as punitive or exemplary damages.

Mr. President, for some reason or other, the nature of which it is not necessary now to canvass, we have deemed it not the part of wisdom to denounce unfair competition as criminal, to subject the person against whom the charge may be made to prosecution as for crime. Several reasons have been urged. In the first place, it has been suggested, and very properly suggested, that, try as anyone may, we can all understand a large group of practices which all of us would say will fall under the condemnation of this act; and yet, beyond those, many will arise concerning which opinions will vary and differ as to whether they do or do not fall within the condemnation of the act. There a man is subjected to a severe burden by this provision.

Mr. President, I dare say the Senator will agree with the rule laid down by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on yesterday. No one can question its soundness. The law having denounced unfair competition as unlawful, anyone who suffers damage by reason of the doing of an unlawful act has a right of action. He has a right of action without any express declaration in the statute. Not only has he a right of action, but he has a right of action which he may prosecute in any court, State or National.

I think it is very questionable whether this right of action for damages, no matter how inconsequential or trifling it may be, should be given to the Federal courts. I think it exceedingly unwise to throw into that court the possibility of the trial of an action involving little claims of $100 or $200.

For that reason, Mr. President, I think that that provision is particularly objectionable, and I do not think triple damages ought to be imposed so long as we have not deemed it wise to denounce these acts as criminal. If we leave the damages to be recovered only to those actually suffered, you are not doing anything at all by the incorporation of this section in the law, and, accordingly, it ought not to be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. CLAPP. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Bristow	James	Overman	Stone
Bryan	Johnson	Owen	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Thomas
Chilton	Kenyon	Perkins	Thornton
Clapp	Kern	Pittman	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Pomerene	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Weeks
Crawford	Lee, Md.	Reed	West
Culberson	Lewis	Shafroth	White
Cummins	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Gronna	Myers	Simmons

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. This announcement should have been made earlier. It will stand for the balance of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota by striking out the word "threefold."

Mr. CLAPP. That simply would be, of course, to eliminate the amendment, because undoubtedly a suit for the actual dam ages could be recovered without any direct authorization. I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is an amendment in the third degree, the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota being an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the ruling made heretofore that is not the case. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before voting upon the question I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that if the bill itself would define an offense that the average man could understand I would favor the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota fixing a threefold punishment for a disobedience of the law, but inasmuch as up to this time there is no definition of the words "unfair competition" which any Senator understands or which anyone else can be supposed to understand at the present time, I should vote against punishing a man for committing an offense which he does not understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask to have the amendment read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 6 the following:

SEC. 6. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or may be found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

It is now proposed to strike out the word "threefold" where it appears, so that it will read:

And shall recover the damages by him sustained and the costs of the suit, together with a reasonable attorney's fee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Sherman Act contains this clause. The bill which is now being considered, if it means anything, if it means what its authors think it means, will embrace a very large number of acts which are now covered by the Sherman Antitrust Acts. If you place in this bill a clause similar to that contained in the antitrust acts and a suit is brought by a citizen for damages there can be no question as to the rule of damages; whether it is held that his action is based upon the antitrust acts as they now exist or whether based upon this act the measure of damages will be the same. But if you strike out the clause "threefold damages," it is easy to imagine a case brought by a citizen where it will be a matter of doubt whether the act complained of comes under the rule of damages as expressed in this bill, or whether it will come under the rule of damages as expressed in the Sherman Antitrust Acts. For that reason I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota ought not to be emasculated.

Mr. President, I have for the last two or three years been impressed with the thought that the real enforcement of the antitrust laws of this country would ultimately be found in the fact that the citizen injured will begin to insist upon his rights in the court and enforce the damages clauses of that act. In a number of instances suits of that kind have been brought, and whenever the way is clearly marked out and the road is made easy by virtue of certain provisions that have been written in the Clayton bill which is soon to come before the Senate, and I refer especially to those provisions which specify that when a matter has been once adjudicated the judgment can be used as evidence in suits by parties who were not named in the action; whenever we arrive at that condition where the enforcement of the remedy for the injury of the citizen is made easy, it is my opinion that there will be found great force and vitality in the antitrust acts. So I think the most valuable provision there is to-day in the antitrust acts of this country is that provision which gives the citizen the opportunity to sue and recover threefold damages.

Mr. President, why should not that apply to this bill? If we can judge what this bill is intended to cover by the statements of its authors and the members of the committee it is in every instance intended to reach unfair, dishonest, crooked, oppressive, coercive acts. It is not intended to cover mere mistakes. It is intended to reach acts which are in their nature tortious and wicked and wrong, not to say villainous.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. Let me finish this sentence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment.

Why, then, should we deal gently with that kind of practice? Why should we not allow threefold damages as we do under the antitrust acts?

I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. I wanted to ask the Senator if he recalls that this is identical with section 5 of the Clayton bill, which has been reported to the Senate, and does he not think that it would be more nearly in its right place in the Clayton bill than here? This is identical with section 5 of the Clayton bill as passed by the House and which section was reported to the Senate without amendment by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. REED. But I do not think that clause of the Clayton bill is so drawn that it will cover the matters coming within the purview of this bill.

Mr. CHILTON. It reads this way:

SEC. 5. That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

That is section 5 of the Clayton bill that has been passed by the House and has been reported to the Senate without any amendment by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLAPP. That would not cover accidents under this bill by any means. It has not and never will be called one of the antitrust laws. This is an interstate trade commission bill.

Mr. CHILTON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I think by the definitions it is an antitrust law.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not aimed at trusts. It is aimed at a practice that has grown up outside of the trust combination practices, and that is why it is necessary to prohibit unfair competition in addition to the antitrust legislation of the country. There is no quesion about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will yield, the point suggested by the Senator from West Virginia is settled, I think, in this way: The first section of the Clayton bill defines what are called antitrust laws. That definition includes the antitrust act of 1890, the similar provisions in the two tariff laws, and the law, if it becomes one, embraced in the Clayton bill, but it does not embrace the act which we are now considering, but, if I may be permitted to say so at this time, I think that a section exactly like the one in the Clayton bill ought to be put in this bill if the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is adopted, so that an order of the court under section 5 will become prima facie evidence in favor of a person who sues for damages under section 5, and I have no doubt that will follow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was about to make a statement similar to that which has been made. When we turn to the Clayton bill, which has not yet been passed, but which, I hope, will in some form become a law, we find the first section defines antitrust laws. It reads:

> That "antitrust laws," as used herein, includes the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," of August 27, 1894; an act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913; and also this act.

That will embrace all of the antitrust statutes now upon the books, and if adopted will embrace the Clayton act, but it has no words incorporating into that definition or description the so-called trade commission act.

When we come to the trade commission act we find that the term "antitrust acts" is defined substantially as it is defined in the act I have just read. I hardly think it worth while to read it, because there can be no dispute.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to say to the Senator that, after looking at it, I believe he is right.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that brings us squarely down to the question of whether this amendment ought to be adopted, and, if so, whether we ought to eliminate the threefold damage clause and provide simply for ordinary damages. I was observing, when I was interrupted, that I believed we will within a few years learn that the antitrust acts in this country find their most potential enforcement through the suits of private parties. If you can ever establish a system by which it is easy for the private individual to prove his case, a system that does not require him to expend months of time and labor to prove matters that have already been once proven in court and solemnly adjudicated, the number of those suits will be such that men will find there is no profit to be made in organizing trusts and monopolies, because after they have organized them, and after they shall have "plucked" the public, they will be liable to lose all they have made, and, in addition to that, be mulcted in damages. That seems to me to be the most hopeful solution the future holds.

Now, we are enacting new legislation here. We are declaring that we intend to do something that will strike a death blow to monopoly; we propose to arrest its progress in its infancy. We are dealing not with honest mistakes of judgment, but with acts which are in their nature malicious, with the same class of conspiracies exactly as the Sherman Antitrust Act deals with, except that we propose to strike those acts in their incipiency instead of after they have been actually worked out into a complete system of monopoly or restraint of trade.

Therefore, I am in favor of passing this amendment and of passing it as it is written, not of emasculating it. I have no tenderness in my heart for those people who start out deliberately to monopolize trade or to embark upon a scheme of destroying competition; who proceed not by honest and fair means, but by oppressive and dishonest and fraudulent methods.

Moreover, there is a reason for giving threefold damages. In many instances the damage which can be proven is small in dollars and cents; not sufficient to warrant a suit, because the net has been so spread that it does not take much from one individual, but takes a vast aggregate from all of the people. So, I think that, in order to make it worth while to sue, we ought to do as was done by the wise men who wrote the Sherman Antitrust Act. We should follow their same example and adopt the rule of damages which they laid down.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from Minnesota a question. I do not know that I understand precisely the object of his amendment. This proposed act declares that unfair competition is unlawful, and the amendment proposes that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act" may sue and recover threefold damages.

Does that mean that that suit may begin after the commission has declared a given method to be an unfair method of competition, or is the man to be punished for having employed a method which, in any opinion of the commission, may be pronounced and declared to be unfair? It looks to me as if this provision might be retroactive in a rather oppressive manner. If the commission, for example, were to decide soon after it was organized, or at any time, that the practice of some corporations in making a purchaser from them agree not to sell the goods which they sell to him for less than a certain price was unfair competition, as I think it would decide, then could that man be punished for the act to which that decision was applicable which he had performed before the commission had rendered its decision?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's inquiry I can only say what I have said in answer to the same inquiry by others. The same question would probably arise under the Sherman antitrust law, where the same provision is found, or it might arise possibly under the Clayton bill, where the same provision is also found. Congress declares that unfair competition is unlawful and forbids it, but I believe that the courts will finally hold that no act is a violation of this proposed law until the commission has made its declaration to that effect. Take the case that I used in the former discussion here this afternoon of what is called "local underselling" for the purpose of destroying competition, transportation accounted for, and all that.

If this law of its own force makes local underselling an offense, then, of course, it does not depend upon the subsequent decision of the commission, and any man engaged in local underselling—with the technical terminology which would make the offense complete, of course—does it at his peril and should take the responsibility of his act. On the other hand, as I am inclined to view this proposed law, local underselling is not made an offense per se by the law, although it will be made so in the Clayton bill if it goes through in its present form; but, eliminating the Clayton bill, then, while we have made unfair competition unlawful, we have not per se made local underselling unlawful until the commission declares that it is one of the practices prohibited by this act, just as the Congress declares that a rate must be reasonable. A rate can not be said to be reasonable as a matter of law, even in the initiative, until the Interstate Commerce Commission has so declared.

This amendment simply shares the fate of all the provisions of this bill. Men must construe this proposed law; they must be bound by it, and I do not think men engaged in the subterranean methods of crushing competition will themselves have any difficulty about knowing whether they are engaged in unfair competition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Clayton bill pronounces, for example, that local underselling, with the intent of stifling and destroying competition, is punishable in a certain way——

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to that bill; but you can not punish anybody for local underselling under the provisions of the Clayton bill until after that becomes by pronouncement of the Clayton bill a penalized offense. Therefore you can not punish anybody for local underselling when the local underselling had taken place prior to the time at which Congress pronounced underselling to be a penalized offense.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the Senator will pardon me for just a moment——

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There has been a great deal said about the definition of "unfair competition," and it seems to me that much has been said unnecessarily. There are a whole lot of things in this world that are indefinable which are yet not inapplicable. I could not define in a satisfactory way what a fraudulent device is; I could not satisfactorily define what the getting of money under a fraudulent pretense is, nor even fraud itself; but I could give anybody a great many instances of acts that would be included within either of those phrases.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, as a rule the Senator would have very little difficulty in advising a client whether a contemplated act was or was not one of those offenses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I would probably have very little difficulty as to that, although sometimes I might conclude that some act was or was not an offense, and the court might hold otherwise; that has frequently happened with some better lawyers than I am.

Unfair methods of stifling competition is what is meant by this bill or what is sought to be intended by the phrase "unfair competition." Before the Commerce Committee of the Senate I cited a great many such methods; and I want to put some of them in the RECORD to-day, so that, although man after man has been challenged to define the phrase "unfair competition," and has failed to do so, the country may understand, or that small part of the country that reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may understand, that while the expression is not capable of an abstract definition, it is capable of concrete application all the way through. For example, the Sugar Trust has held its power over trade very largely by prescribing that its customers shall sell sugar at a price to be dictated by it from week to week and from day to day. I think that is an unfair method of stifling competition.

Again, many great concerns in this country sell goods to merchants at a certain price, upon the condition that they shall export those goods and shall not sell them in the United States, nor give American citizens the benefit of the price at which they were bought. That, I hope, this commission will decide to be an unfair practice. It is certainly an unpatriotic one.

Many others of the so-called trusts keep their throat-hold upon American industry by prescribing that their customers shall not sell outside of a certain territory; some of them, that they shall not buy outside of a certain territory; some others, that their customers shall not buy from others engaged in producing competing articles. Others have gone so far as to sell upon the condition that their customers shall not sell even within the United States below a retail price to be fixed by them.

Since these instances were originally given, the Supreme Court has decided that under existing law that practice is unlawful in a case which went up from Memphis, Tenn.

Another example, familiar to most of us, is to be found in the great shoe industry of this country, which is to-day shackled by the fact that the United States Shoe Manufacturing Machinery Co. will not sell them at all certain machinery for bottoming shoes, a device which, because of its great value, has become absolutely necessary to the shoe industry, or even lease that machine to them unless the shoe factory leasing it agrees to buy a whole lot of other machinery from the same company and not to buy machinery like it from competing companies. That, again, strikes me as one of the things that constitute unfair competition.

In clause 3 of section 1 of a bill which I have introduced here it was intended to meet all of these evils, as far as I could draw upon my imagination for them.

The Clayton bill meets most of them. Most of the very practices that constitute unfair competition are substantially declared by the Clayton bill to be penalized.

The difference, however, between this amendment with regard to the retroactive feature and the other bills is this: We adopted an amendment this morning by means of which some of the court rights of a man were cut off, and it was done because it was stated that by analogy with the interstate commerce law it ought to be done; and my friend, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], made a very eloquent and a very profound legal argument, but during his legal argument he forgot one distinction which was very clearly made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] the other day, and that was that the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission applies only to the future, while this bill declares unlawful acts that have been committed in the past. If men are to suffer a threefold damage before the commission has defined an act to be one of the acts which involve unfair competition, then the argument made by the Senator from Missouri has a great deal of force in it.

I am glad to say that I was one of the men at the other end of this building who had a great deal to do with the enactment of the so-called Hepburn bill. We sent it from that end of the Capitol as if it came from a catapult, with a united, unanimous vote, to the doors of this Chamber; and that had much to do with its passing here. When in connection with that legislation we discussed the jurisdiction of the courts upon review, and confined and limited it, we did so because in that case the commission did nothing except to say, "Hereafter this rate shall not be charged; and hereafter, if this rate is charged it shall be punishable; and hereafter if the rate which we prescribe as reasonable is varied from such action, will be punishable." This bill does not do that; this bill refers to the past.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not understand this bill exactly as does the Senator. I do not understand that the trade commission will have any jurisdiction over any act or that this bill will cover any act except such an one as shall have been committed after the bill has been passed. I do not know of any retroactive clause in it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. Of course, upon that question there can not be any dispute between him and me, or between any two sensible men. No act could do that if it wanted to. It can not make anybody punishable ex post facto. What I am talking about, however, is not that this act goes back beyond its passage, but that a thing which is for the first time defined by the commission to be unfair competition, and therefore for the first time defined to be unlawful, is punishable before the commission so pronounces it.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator, then, to mean that the act itself is so vague, indefinite, and uncertain that it gives no notice to any man as to the things coming within its domain?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I hope the Senator does not so understand me.

Mr. REED. If it does give a notice, then they ought to be punished. If it does not give a notice, it ought not to be passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not care about being kept on my feet. I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech at all. Of course, I do not take the position that the phrase "unfair competition" is so vague that it gives no notice, but I do say, and every man must know, that it does not give specific notice with the accuracy of an indictment. It is very possible that many things that are done all over the business world now, and that most business men regard as fair and lawful, may be held by this commission to be unfair and unlawful.

Take the case of the man who carried that case up from Memphis, who had bought certain goods from wholesalers who sold only on condition that he should sell at a certain retail price, and who said: "Why, I can make money selling below that retail price; I have bought these goods; they are my property, and after you have parted with them I do not care what contract you made me make in order to buy them; they are my property." When the Supreme Court held that the contract which the wholesalers had made with him, attempting to force him to sell at a certain price, was contrary to public policy and nullified it, and upheld the man in selling at whatever price he chose, there was an illustration of a practice that was quite prevalent, which the majority of the business men of this country thought was lawful and fair; and yet the Supreme Court pronounced it, even without this law, unlawful and unfair.

It strikes me that if the Senator would just vary the language of his amendment somewhat, so that it would cover the idea of prohibiting "anything declared to be unlawful by this act or declared by the commission to be an unfair method of competition," and then go on and fix its punishment, it would be more nearly in accord with the universal law of justice.

Mr. CLAPP. The trouble with that is that it might establish one rule for the man who was aggrieved and an entirely different rule as to the fact of the law itself taking effect. I do not know whether the courts are going to hold that a particular act which could be illustrated is or is not of itself forbidden by this act; whether or not it must wait until the commission has made its declaration; and the two should stand or fall together. There should not be one rule of action for the man who seeks a recovery and another rule of action with reference to the operation and effect of the law itself as governed by the decision of the courts.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I can not escape the conviction that it would be better not to incorporate this proposed provision, in any of the forms suggested, in this bill. There is such a provision in laws that have been passed heretofore and in the so-called Clayton bill; but the situation presented in those laws and in that bill, it seems to me, is radically different from that which confronts us when we consider the pending measure.

This proposed trade-commission law is an experimental legislative enterprise upon which we are entering, and it is far wider in the field it will cover than the interstate-commerce law or the Sherman antitrust law or the Clayton bill. It deals with a far greater variety of subjects. Innumerable cases will arise under this statute, if it becomes one, forbidding unfair competition, wholly different in their facts and in the real principles involved than can possibly arise under the antitrust laws, under the interstate-commerce law, or under the Clayton bill.

I am impressed with the belief that, as a matter of public policy, it would not be advisable at this time in this statute to give to every man who felt that he was in some wise oppressed or imposed upon by what he might be pleased to designate "unfair competition" the right to institute a suit in court. The learned junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] contended, in some remarks he made recently, that in his opinion the right to sue, if this bill becomes a law in its present form, even without inserting the proposed amendment, would exist as completely as if the amendment should be put in. I think I correctly understood him. The Senator indicates by nodding his head that I did. If that be true, then, Mr. President, there would be no need of incorporating this amendment in the bill. I am not satisfied in my own mind that the right to sue in the absence of the amendment would exist, though I express that opinion with greater hesitation than I otherwise would because of the conviction expressed by the Senator from Montana and one or two other able lawyers in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I speak with some degree of confidence about the matter, because I had occasion to appeal to the principle in a proceeding of this character:

A hotel was destroyed by fire. The local statute required that every hotel should have in each of its rooms a rope or other contrivance which would permit guests to escape in case of fire, and a penalty was prescribed for failure to observe the act. That was all there was to it. We contended, and successfully contended, that one injured who would have escaped conveniently if the fire escape had been provided, had a right of action against the owners of the hotel. The act of not having the fire escape being denounced by the statute as being unlawful, the right to recover for injuries received by reason of the fact that the fire escape was not there was sustained by the court.

Mr. STONE. I am not sure by any means that the case stated by the Senator from Montana would run parallel with cases that would arise under this bill. In the case to which he refers there was an act requiring fire escapes in structures such as the one in question in that case——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it was denounced as unlawful not to have them.

Mr. STONE. And, as the Senator from Mississippi says, the statute made it unlawful not to have the fire escapes. A guest at the hotel was injured, in a fire which destroyed the hotel, because of the absence of the fire escape. I should think that the right to sue in such a case would be clear, but I am not entirely certain that it is so clear in cases that would arise under this bill.

Mr. President, if suit can be brought anyhow, as the Senator from Montana thinks, then I suppose no harm would result by asserting the right to sue in the statute itself; but if there is a question about it, as it seems to me there is, then I halt when the proposal is made to confer the right in terms by the statute.

As I said a moment ago, innumerable instances will arise where individuals and corporations may contend that they have been injured by some oppressive misconduct of a business nature, leveled at them by some other corporation. The number of these suits that might be brought no man can estimate. Is there not a real danger that if the right to bring such a suit is conferred, whether the Federal trade commission has passed on the case or not—that is, independently of the trade commission—a certain class of lawyers, especially in large communities, will arise to ply the vocation of hunting up and working up such suits?

Mr. WEST. "Razorback" lawyers.

Mr. STONE. My friend calls them "razorback" lawyers. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests the designation of "ambulance chasers," and other designations have been applied to them. The kind of lawyers to whom I refer are well known. When these attorneys or their agents hear that complaint has been made that somebody has been imposing upon somebody else through what is called "unfair competition," they will offer to stop it by suit for damages, and possibly by a suit for injunction; for, I suppose, if you can bring a suit for damages in such cases you can also seek to prevent the continuance of the wrong complained of. Thus we would have opened up two tribunals to which appeals might be made, one the commission and the other the district court.

Now, Mr. President, if we should find that some individual had gone into a district court with a suit for damages under the provisions of this law, which he clearly would have a right to do if this amendment is inserted, and the court should hold that on the facts developed at the hearing the statute had been violated, that the acts complained of did constitute unfair competition and were therefore unlawful, and let the case go to the jury to determine the damages, there would be a rule judicially established. It is not difficult to suppose that in the future—not a great while thereafter, perhaps—some proceeding would be instituted before the trade commission in which exactly the same state of facts would be developed, and if the commission should hold on the hearing that the facts did not constitute unfair competition, you would have another rule established by the commission. Thus you would have two rules of action established by two tribunals, each having a jurisdictional right to hear and pass upon the complaints severally made to them.

I fear it would lead to confusion; and inasmuch as this is an experimental kind of legislation we are entering upon, may we not undertake to do too much? Let us get the commission, and give to it all reasonably necessary authority, and stop there. With the right of appeal to the courts given to the parties it seems to me that in due time a system of judicature would be developed around the statute, building up just such a system as has been developed around the interstate-commerce law. I am fearful about putting amendments of this nature in the bill. I have a well-formed conviction that if we attempt to do too much we will accomplish less for the public good.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to argue this question, but it seems to me that the difficulty suggested by my colleague is unescapable if this law means what its authors claim it means. It has been said here by the authors of the bill that it is intended to prohibit every kind of unfair and oppressive trade practice. They have proceeded to catalogue all those acts which have been condemned by the courts in the various antitrust decisions as coming within the purview of this act. Among those acts so catalogued which these gentlemen say will come within the meaning of the term "unfair competition" are many acts now actionable at law. As to those acts now actionable by law there is no way you can deny the citizen the right to go into the courts, and if he does go into the courts he will obtain a decision, and that decision might be in conflict with a decision of a trade commission, just as a decision rendered by a court in a case brought under the Clapp amendment might be in conflict with a decision of the commission.

That is the defect I see in the very persuasive observations made by my colleague. To illustrate that defect, I call attention to the fact that it is claimed this bill will cover the imitation of goods of A by B in trade, so that A in fact defrauds B of his trade and defrauds the public. That is already actionable.

It can be prevented in equity and damages can be recovered at law. It is claimed that the term covers trade slanders. That is already actionable both at law and in equity. It is claimed that it covers the practice of spying upon another's business, coupled with the use of that information in a way to injure and destroy the business of another. That is certainly actionable. Now, as this is the present legal situation, we can not escape the difficulty suggested by my colleague. Indeed, it seems to me that if we could have court decisions for a guide, they would serve as milestones which might be followed by this commission; the members of the commission are not required under the terms of this bill to be either learned in the principles of the law or of equity; neither is the commission required to proceed in accordance with the rules of law. Therefore I do not think the objection is a sound one.

But I can not refrain from expressing my astonishment that it is actually proposed to set up a tribunal and give it a power which affects nearly all the business of the United States, and that power is to be exercised under a so-called statute which is so indefinite, so vague, that the authors of the bill say it would be unjust to punish any citizen for violating it.

That, sir, is a pitiable plea. That is a confession of judgment. That is an admission you are doing a dangerous thing. Whoever puts upon the statute books of this country a law so vague that the citizen can not understand that law, so vague that he dare not punish the citizen for violating it, has done that which seems to me is not only unjustifiable, but reprehensible in the highest degree.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I understand the Senator's chief complaint here has been that the term "unfair competition" is so vague and indefinite that nothing of a settled nature can be derived therefrom. How, then, can the Senator consistently advocate that a man under the clause can be mulcted in triple damages?

Mr. REED. I can make that argument and yet be very consistent. I have said that this law is vague and is indefinite and is uncertain, and therefore that it ought to be made definite and certain, and I am still contending for that. But Senators on the other side say it is not vague, that it is not indefinite, that its meaning will be easily understood, and therefore they justify themselves in forcing it upon the country, and having by that argument justified themselves in forcing it upon the country they now turn squarely around and in the same breath say that it is so meaningless, so vague, and so uncertain that no man ought to be punished for its violation.

That is equivalent to saying that you fear your own law; that you are creating a Frankenstein; and that you tremble lest its giant strength will be used to strike and destroy. You now admit that you do not know how far you are going nor what mischief may follow.

I appeal to the Senate to put a guide in this law, a definition in this law, which will enable a citizen to know what it means, without first going to a tribunal that may be 3 000 miles from his home in order to ascertain what that tribunal may guess it means. If you pass a law that is so meaningless that it can not be understood, and yet power is conferred by it, then its meaning is not to be gained from the terms of the law itself, but must be gained from the decision of a commission. Stated differently, you have given the commission the power to make a law, for you have given it power to construe a meaning into a law which is, in fact, without meaning. That is but another way of saying that you have given the commission power to make anything legal or illegal, according to its own will. How can you escape the conclusion that you are conferring upon the commission a grant of arbitrary power? Such a law is at war with every principle of American Government.

It is a startling thing, an astonishing thing, to find men willing to confer upon an unnamed and perhaps an unlearned commission authority to enforce upon the people of the United States their construction of a law which is so vague that its authors dare not give the right to a citizen to sue under it, or a court the right to enforce it for the benefit of the citizen.

We can set up a guide. We can define these wrongs. We can set forth the long list of dishonest and oppressive acts that has been rehearsed during this debate and specifically prohibit them. Thus we will have reached the great evils that now confront us, or we can in general terms describe the character and nature of the acts and practices which are prohibited.

No tribunal of earth should be intrusted with authority to enforce a law the ordinary citizen can not understand. No law is fit for a free people that can not be read and understood by the people. What tyrant was it who nailed his laws so high the people could not see them, and then punished the people for violating a law they had no chance to know existed and hence could never have understood? We make a law so vague it can not be understood; we stand here admitting it can not be understood by the ordinary citizen of the country or by the lawyer learned in all the principles of law, and say then that man shall be held to such a law as that.

The vouchers for this bill not only admit the citizen and lawyer can not understand what it means, but they now tell us it is so very bad, vague, obscure, misty, uncertain, and indefinite that no court can understand it or be trusted to construe it.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator wants to impose penalties on them as well.

Mr. REED. Sir, I take this position: That this bill as it now is written must have a guide put in, and I am seizing this opportunity, if possible, to point out the fact that those who insist upon the vague phrase "unfair competition is hereby declared unlawful" are embarking upon an enterprise the end of which they can not even guess.

Mr. President, I do not like to differ from so many of my friends on this side. It is not pleasant. But surely we ought not to be passing laws which we are forced in advance to admit that no human being can know what they mean until a commission guesses at what they mean.

Let us see whether there are any hardships connected with such an enactment. Here is a man engaged in business in San Francisco. It may be a small business, nevertheless interstate. He is served with a notice, and thereupon he must travel across the continent to the city of Washington where this commission sits. He must bring his witnesses or he must bring their depositions. He must employ his attorney. All this to meet what? To meet a charge of violating a law he can not understand and that nobody in the world understands; to answer for a practice he did not know was prohibited and nobody else knew was prohibited; to be tried for doing a thing under a law that is so meaningless he did not have the slightest idea of violating it. He can not know. He never had a chance to know until after he has traveled across the continent and the commission advises him what its guess is.

How many of these cases will you have? Who shall undertake to count them? Who will number them? There are millions of business transactions taking place in this country every day. The aggregate of each day's business runs into billions, and for every single act there is the possibility of a complaint before this commission. What does the law mean? What is included within the term of the act?

A man is engaged in selling coal in California and also in four or five other States. He is selling it at $5 a ton. He is making a profit of 25 cents a ton. He has been established a long time. Another man enters the city of San Francisco to compete with him. He is only selling in the city of San Francisco. In order to get the first man's trade he is willing to cut his price to $4.75, knowing that if he can establish his coal at $4.75 the other man will be obliged not only to cut the price of coal in San Francisco but under the rule which it is said is embraced within these vague terms, if he cuts the price at San Francisco he must cut it in all the States where he is doing business just as he cuts it in San Francisco. Accordingly he withdraws from San Francisco because he would better lose the trade of San Francisco than to cut the price at all other places to a point where he can not make a penny. Accordingly the competitor who has come into San Francisco now occupies the field alone and is able to sell coal at $5.50 a ton. Thus, in this instance, the law intended to destroy monopoly has resulted in creating monopoly.

When a condition like that used in my illustration is presented and the merchant is confronted with the question whether he can meet the cut in San Francisco or not, he turns to that law. He finds no rule. No lawyer can tell him what it means. He only knows that here at Washington sit those who are privileged to interpret its Delphic language. He does not know what that august board will say. He only knows the board may at any time summon him to come before it, and that he must come upon peril of having his business ruined by an injunction. He only knows he must cross the continent and bring his lawyers and evidence and submit himself to the arbitrament of five gentlemen who can construe a law any way they please and prohibit anything they do not like.

Mr. President, the illustration I gave is not the best which might be imagined. It is true this bill affects great trusts and great combinations, but it also affects every man and corporation engaged in interstate commerce. Many of them are small. A complaint may be lodged against a dealer whose yearly profits may not be $5 000 or may not be $3 000. Upon a complaint being made, perhaps by a malicious rival, the dealer must be dragged across this continent for what? For violating the law that he can understand? No. For violating a law the Senate can understand? No. For violating a law that the different authors of this bill and the committee themselves understand? No. But for violating a rule that is so vague that only the infinite God, who can look into the future and read the minds of the commission and know what their decision will be, could advise him in advance with reference to.

I do beseech Members of the Senate, and in what I say I know I weary them, and perhaps disgust them, that we shall write a rule here that somebody can understand. When you talk about giving 90 per cent of the business concerns of this country or 60 per cent or 40 per cent over to the control of a commission acting under a law so vague that you admit the citizen can not understand it and therefore you fear to give the citizen the right to sue under it; I say, as I have said before, and as others have said, you are conferring a power more arbitrary and more dangerous than is possessed by any despot of this earth. You are setting up a commission here, and if you will give it a proper rule that it must follow I shall welcome the commission; but when you lay down the rule that is to be followed, that rule ought to be so plain that the ordinary man can have a reasonable conception of its meaning. It should be so plain that if this commission proceeding under it denies to a citizen his substantial rights or ravishes him of his constitutional privileges he can have his recourse to courts where the law is known and administered.

I know there are men—and good men and wise men—who have a great prejudice against our Federal courts. I agree that much of the criticism leveled against the Federal courts has been just. I think it is true, and that I can say with entire propriety, that for a number of years the tendency of the Federal courts was too much in favor of great property interests. Why was that? It was, at least in part, because great interests had been able to control to some extent the appointment of Federal judges. If that is true, if great interests could control in part or in toto the selection of men for the Federal judiciary, the same great interests, the same great influences can be, and ultimately may be, equally potential in the selection of this commission.

Then where will we be? Surely in an infinitely worse situation than we are now or ever have been, and why? Because when a Federal court has decided a question it has necessarily been decided with the litigants upon both sides in court; it has been decided with the full right of appeal, with rules of law and precedents to be appealed to in the appellate courts. Every decision has become a precedent and the courts have always had before them the thought that if they wrote bad law they wrote it not for that case alone but for all the cases that were to come after.

So we have never found a time when in the end the courts have not come around to about what was right. Any man who reads the late decision of the Supreme Court upon the trust act will see that step by step they have been advancing into that field which has been occupied by combinations and trusts, and day by day they have been striking them down.

But if it be true, as is charged by some, that the courts have been unduly influenced and swerved, if their appointment has been controlled, if evil influences have been able to reach into the very temple of justice itself, what will some day happen with a commission appointed in the same way and proceeding under a rule of law so vague that no man dare hazard a guess as to what it means?

A commission is all right within its proper sphere. But what is its proper sphere? First, a law should be written, a rule to guide this commission; second, it could investigate and could undoubtedly produce a vast fund of information that might not only be used by it in the enforcement of that rule of law, but that could also be used by litigants when they went into the court.

I never expected to see the day when the law of the land would not be preferred over the decree of five gentlemen, or when the courts of justice would be distrusted by those who were willing to turn over the business of this country to five men, empowered to construe a meaningless and vague law as they may see fit, to declare that to be valid which suits their taste, and to strike down all who dare differ from their arbitrary and unbridled power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

BUREAU OF LABOR SAFETY.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion temporarily and yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent to submit a favorable report from the Committee on Education and Labor on House bill 10735, to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor, and to submit a report (No. 712) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to submit at this time a report from the Committee on Education and Labor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The report will be received and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BRISTOW presented petitions of sundry citizens of Eureka, Colby, Kanorado, Formoso, and of the first congressional district, all in the State of Kansas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Plumbers' and Steamfitters' Local Union No. 609, of Manhattan, Kans., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to recognize Dr. Cook in the matter of the discovery of the North Pole, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brookfield Junction, Conn., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURTON presented a petition of Local Union No. 330, International Molders' Union, of Ironton, Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 1, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit, from whom proceedeth life and its marvelous possibilities, impress us with the individual responsibility resting upon us as citizens of a great Republic, that each may strive earnestly and patriotically to add somewhat to its intellectual, moral, and spiritual life; that good may increase, evil diminish, harmony prevail; that as a nation we may advance steadily toward the ideal in Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6192. An act to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On July 30, 1914:

S. 485. An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

On July 27, 1914:

S. 5462. An act to authorize the county of Barry, State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the White River in Barry County, Mo., at or near a point known as Goldens Ferry; and

S. 5957. An act to authorize the Frost-Johnson Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the Sabine River in the States of Louisiana and Texas, about 2 miles west of Hunter, La.

On July 28, 1914:

S. 785. An act to relinquish, release, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to certain lands in the State of Mississippi;

S. 1087. An act authorizing the exchange of certain lands within the Fishlake National Forest, Utah; and

S. 5316. An act authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6192. An act to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 1, 1914.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York requests leave of absence for five days on account of the unveiling of statue to Baron von Steuben.

CHARLES A. TALCOTT.

BATH, N. Y., July 30, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am going to sail for London to-morrow with my wife to attend the annual meeting of the Interparliamentary Union at Stockholm. I expect to be absent about five weeks. Will you kindly present my request to the House to be excused for that length of time?

With kind regards, I remain,
Very cordially, yours,

EDWIN S. UNDERHILL.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the granting of these requests?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to the last request—the request of the gentleman who wants to go abroad. We are afraid the dogs of war will get hold of him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] objects to the last one, and not the first one. Without objection, the first one will be granted.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MERRIMAC RIVER, MASS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 6101, to grant the consent of Congress for the city of Lawrence, county of Essex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimac River, and pass the bill. I may say, Mr. Speaker, this bill is identical with a House bill on the calendar which has been reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] moves to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 6101, a similar House bill being on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman asks the Speaker to lay it before the House?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6101) to grant the consent of Congress for the city of Lawrence, county of Essex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimac River.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the city of Lawrence, county of Essex, State of Massachusetts, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Merrimac River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the foot of Amesbury Street, in the city of Lawrence, in the county of Essex, in the State of Massachusetts, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that House bill 17882 be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill of similar tenor will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER, ARK.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is another bill in the same condition, introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY]. It is Senate bill 6084. I ask that the Speaker lay it before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the bill S. 6084 be taken from the Speaker's table and passed, a similar bill being on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6084) to grant the consent of Congress for the county of Pulaski, State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the county of Pulaski, State of Arkansas, and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Arkansas River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation from Broadway Street, in the city of Little Rock, Ark., to a point on the north bank of the said river, in the city of Argenta, county of Pulaski, Ark., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay House bill 17637, of similar tenor, on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

PAYMENTS UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. To call up Senate bill 4628, extending the payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and to ask that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado calls up Senate bill 4628 and asks that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a quarter of a second. I shall not raise any question with reference to the conferees to be named, because I shall have faith that the conferees will support the position of the House, which position was announced by a very large vote on the Underwood amendment, although all the gentlemen named as conferees on the part of the House voted against the amendment, and all the Senators who are named as conferees on the part of the Senate are also known to be against it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not express any opinion to me. I accept in good faith his sense of responsibility.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]?

Mr. FALCONER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. FALCONER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask unanimous consent to insert a little clipping from the Washington Herald on this question that is involved in the query propounded by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a clipping from the Washington Herald on the subject. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman ought to do that under this proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was reserving the right to object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Washington does not object to the bill going to conference.

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent, anyhow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. RAKER, and Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FALCONER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent to insert a newspaper article on this question of annual appropriations for the Reclamation Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a newspaper article on the subject of annual appropriations for the Reclamation Service. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DR. THOMAS J. KEMP.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present from the Committee on the Judiciary a privileged adverse report (No. 1058) on House resolution 572, and ask that it be printed and that its consideration go over until next week; and I now give notice that I shall call up the resolution next week. I also ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the ranking Republican member of the Committee on the Judiciary, have the right to file a minority report.

Mr. MANN. If it is an adverse report, under the rule he can ask to have it placed on the calendar. I hope that the gentleman will ask that it be so placed.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the resolution?

Mr. WEBB. It is a resolution calling upon the President for all papers on file with him or with the Department of Justice in relation to the application for pardon of Dr. Kemp.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report No. 1058 (to accompany H. Res. 572), calling upon the President for papers in the Kemp pardon case.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk an article that I have sent up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk a certain chapter from Thirty Years in the United States Senate, by Thomas Hart Benton. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what is his intention in relation to adjournment to-day?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that all patriots ought to unite, in view of the momentous events to follow this afternoon, to complete the bill in time to go to the baseball. There has been so much debate that I think if gentlemen will offer their amendments and have them voted on we will get through at an early hour.

Mr. MANN. I understand there is to be a baseball game between the Members of the House this afternoon for charitable purposes, and I wondered whether the gentleman would move to adjourn in time to attend the game.

Mr. BUTLER. Will charity be helped much?

Mr. MANN. I think so; and I think we should adjourn early enough, so that Members may attend the game.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it would be doubly charitable if Members were to be so stimulated as to abstain from debate and offer their amendments and get through with the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will agree to talk less than the gentleman from Georgia does.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I will agree not to debate it at all. Let us offer the amendments and vote on them.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am going to do my best to get through and get out of the way of the baseball game.

Mr. MANN. Very well; I shall make the point of no quorum a little before 3 o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I guess we will have to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

"PAIRING OFF.

"At this time, and in the House of Representatives, was exhibited for the first time the spectacle of Members 'pairing off,' as the phrase was; that is to say, two Members of opposite political parties agreeing to absent themselves from the duties of the House, without the consent of the House and without deducting their per diem pay during the time of such voluntary absence. Such agreements were a clear breach of the rules of the House, a disregard of the Constitution, and a practice open to the grossest abuses. An instance of the kind was avowed on the floor by one of the parties to the agreement, by giving as a reason for not voting that he had 'paired off' with another Member, whose affairs required him to go home. It was a strange annunciation and called for rebuke; and there was a Member present who had the spirit to administer it; and from whom it came with the greatest propriety on account of his age and dignity and perfect attention to all his duties as a Member, both in his attendance in the House and in the committee rooms. That Member was Mr. John Quincy Adams, who immediately proposed to the House the adoption of this resolution: 'Resolved, That the practice, first openly avowed at the present session of Congress, of pairing off, involves, on the part of the Members resorting to it, the violation of the Constitution of the United States, of an express rule of this House, and of the duties of both parties in the transaction to their immediate constituents, to this House, and to their country.' This resolve was placed on the calendar to take its turn, but not being reached during the session was not voted upon. That was the first instance of this reprehensible practice, 50 years after the Government had gone into operation; but since then it has become common, and even inveterate, and is carried to great length. Members pair off, and do as they please—either remain in the city, refusing to attend to any duty, or go off together to neighboring cities, or separate, one staying and one going; and the one that remains sometimes standing up in his place and telling the Speaker of the House that he had paired off, and so refusing to vote. There is no justification for such conduct, and it becomes a facile way for shirking duty and evading responsibility. If a Member is under a necessity to go away, the rules of the House require him to ask leave; and the Journals of the early Congresses are full of such applications. If he is compelled to go, it is his misfortune, and should not be communicated to another. This writer had never seen an instance of it in the Senate during his 30 years of service there; but the practice has since penetrated that body, and 'pairing off' has become as common in that House as in the other, in proportion to its numbers, and with an aggravation of the evil, as the absence of a Senator is a loss to his State of half its weight. As a consequence, the two Houses are habitually found voting with deficient numbers—often to the extent of a third—often with a bare quorum.

"In the first age of the Government no Member absented himself from the service of the House to which he belonged without first asking and obtaining its leave; or, if called off suddenly, a colleague was engaged to state the circumstances to the House, and ask the leave. In the Journals of the two Houses for the first 30 years of the Government there is in the index a regular head for 'absent without leave,' and turning to the indicated page every such name will be seen. That head in the index has disappeared in later times. I recollect no instance of leave asked since the last of the early Members—the Macons, Randolphs, Rufus Kings, Samuel Smiths, and John Taylors of Caroline—disappeared from the Halls of Congress."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I think he can be heard in the Committee of the Whole after we go into committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not object. I just ask him to take that course.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Very well.

Mr. ADAMSON. He agrees. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado withdraw his request?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; for the present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that in this bill there is a preamble which should be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. That will be in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. MANN. The striking of it out will come after the vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To make the point of no quorum, for this reason: The great State of New York is represented on this floor at the present moment by only one Member—that great commercial State.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point that there is no quorum present?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. No one has the floor. The Chair is trying to find out whether the gentleman from Connecticut adheres to the point of no quorum.

Mr. DONOVAN. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman withdraws it I shall make it. I am through with this kind of tomfoolery. I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ADAMSON) there were—ayes 64, noes none.

Accordingly a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

COLORADO DAY.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, 1876, 38 years ago to-day, the State of Colorado was admitted into the Union by the proclamation of President Grant, and has ever since been known as the Centennial State. [Applause.]

This is, in my State, a legal holiday, known as "Colorado Day," and at this hour in our capital city, and in many other cities and towns throughout the State, business is suspended, and practically the entire population is celebrating this thirty-eighth anniversary of our statehood. This afternoon in the city park, of our magnificent capital, the bands are playing, there is speaking by public officials, State flag raisings, songs, and parades; the young people are enjoying various kinds of sports; 50 civic, patriotic, and fraternal societies are taking part in the day's festivities; and it is a gala celebration of a happy, patriotic, and prosperous people. [Applause.] The exercises are under the management and auspices of the patriotic order known as the Sons of Colorado, of which I am pleased to be one.

Thirty-eight years ago to-day our State had a population of only a few thousand hardy pioneers, who were nobly battling against the hardships and privations of frontier life. To-day we have a population of nearly a million progressive, well-educated, splendid twentieth-century American citizens. [Applause.] Denver, our State capital, is, we think, the newest, cleanest, and most beautiful city on this continent. It is known throughout the world as "The Queen City of the Plains."

To-day Colorado is the front door of the West, the gateway to the Pacific, the playground of the Nation, and the Switzerland of America. The Centennial State is the top of the world, and the crest of the American continent, the land of bright skies, and 330 sunlit days in every year. The paradise of healthful climate and gorgeous scenery. [Applause.] All mankind bows before Colorado's scenic shrine. Our mountains are filled with minerals, and our valleys are the most fruitful in the world.

Nature has lavished upon our State nearly all of her choicest gifts, and it is indeed the land of inspiration and opportunity. [Applause.] As loyal sons of our beloved Commonwealth the Colorado delegation in the Senate and House of Representatives have just been celebrating this day by presenting to the Union and dedicating the memorial tablet recently furnished by our State and placed in the Washington National Monument; and at this hour a salute of 21 guns is being fired in Denver to commemorate this occasion. [Applause.]

On behalf of my State I want to express to the Marine Band our appreciation of their courtesy in furnishing us the splendid soul-inspiring patriotic music of the occasion, and to thank our beloved Chaplain, Dr. Couden, for his kindness in joining with us in invoking a fervent blessing upon our Commonwealth and the memorial emblem of our State's loyalty to the Union and reverence for the Father of his Country. [Applause.]

The tablet which we have to-day dedicated is placed in the east wall of the Monument at the 290-foot level. It contains the word "Colorado," the figures "1876," and our State's coat of arms, all artistically sculptured upon a block of absolutely spotless pure-white marble, a sample of which I hold in my hands. [Applause.] It is the marble selected by the most distinguished body of men this Nation has ever had upon any commission, to be the material used in the Abraham Lincoln Memorial in this Capital city. And when that structure is completed it will be one of the most magnificent monuments on this planet. This material comes from a solid mountain of pure-white marble near my home in western Colorado. A mountain from which could be taken—if there was powerful enough machinery—a solid block of pure-white marble as large as this Capitol Building. [Applause.]

But I will not delay the proceedings of the House to recite the material wealth or myriads of attractive features of our superb State, but will, on behalf of the entire population of Colorado, extend to you all a cordial invitation to some time visit our State and our people and see for yourself the marvelous scenery, the bright sunshine, the health and wealth that we enjoy.

COME TO COLORADO.

Come up a mile where the air is pure,
Where the skies are clear and blue;
Come up above the smoke and dust,
Where good health waits for you.

[Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Say when!

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. At the first opportunity after this session adjourns. [Applause.] When you enter our capital city you will be greeted with a magnificent bronze arch extending to you a "Welcome," and on your departure you will receive the ancient and heartfelt blessing, "Mizpah"—God be with you till we meet again. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I will insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a brief recital of the ceremonies in commemoration of the dedication of Colorado's memorial tablet in the Washington National Monument. The exercises were held within the monument, on the 290-foot level, adjoining the tablet. I was accorded the honor of presiding and welcoming the Coloradans and our guests and presenting the various speakers.

After music by the Marine Band, the chaplain of the House of Representatives invoked divine blessing upon the occasion, as follows:

PRAYER BY REV. HENRY N. COUDEN.

"Eternal God, our heavenly Father, ever present in the hearts of Thy children to uphold, sustain, and guide them in every onward and upward movement toward the betterment of mankind, we thank Thee for our Republic and the men whose souls live in its sacred institutions 'conceived by our fathers in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.'

"We gather here this morning to add in marble the gratitude of the great State of Colorado to this splendid monument erected to the memory of him whom we delight to call the 'Father of his country.' May this tablet be a perpetual memorial of the loyalty and patriotism of the Centennial State to the Union, whose genius is liberty, justice, righteousness, peace, and good will to all mankind. May its brain and brawn contribute strength, glory, and prosperity to our Nation and honor itself by honoring the Nation whose flag floats in triumphant peace over its fertile soil, lofty mountains, mines of wealth, its schools, colleges, and churches dedicated to the worship of God, now and evermore, in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen."

Thereupon the proclamation of Gov. Ammons, of Colorado, was read by the presiding officer, as follows:

COLORADO DAY PROCLAMATION.

August 1 will be Colorado's thirty-eighth birthday. Some years ago the lawmakers of the State, believing a proper observance of the day would promote a better spirit, greater cooperation among our people, and inspire a higher degree of State pride, provided that the 1st day of August of each year should be a holiday. Having confidence in the wisdom of this purpose, I urge all patriotic societies and all good citizens to join in appropriate exercises, not only to commemorate the splendid accomplishments of the past, but to direct a better spirit of community interest in future progress, that we may secure labor and capital for development, build and maintain needed public institutions, increase the efficiency of State and local governments, improve our social conditions, and make available the wealth of opportunities our matchless climate and varied industrial conditions offer to the enterprising homeseekers of the world.

Let it be our ambition to build worthily upon the broad foundation laid by our far-seeing pioneers, and so conduct our public affairs that we may take just pride in the State, become more loyal in our citizenship and more earnest, patriotic Americans.

We believe in Colorado. Let us show our faith and patriotism by the manner in which we celebrate the natal day of our Commonwealth.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of State to be affixed at Denver, this 21st day of July, A. D. 1914.

ELIAS M. AMMONS,
Governor.

Attest:

JAS. B. PEARCE,
Secretary of State.

Mrs. Edward T. Taylor recited the following poem on the Columbine, the State flower of Colorado:

THE COLUMBINE.

An idle angel, one sunny day,
Sought new means to pass the time away;
And cut a patch from heaven's blue
And looked for something else to do.

Then from a cloud he took some white
And into its center he put sunlight;
Then in the azure he placed the two,
Producing this flower—gold, white, and blue.

This was the birth of the Columbine,
And as it follows its mission divine,
Originating at heaven's gate,
Let it ever be emblem of this grand State.

—J. M. White.

At the conclusion of her recitation, and in the absence of Miss Etta Taylor, who had been designated by the Sons of Colorado for that purpose, she unveiled the memorial tablet, while the band played "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Thereupon Senator CHARLES S. THOMAS made the official presentation of the tablet to the Nation as follows:

SPEECH OF SENATOR CHARLES S. THOMAS IN PRESENTING COLORADO'S MEMORIAL TABLET TO THE NATION.

"Mr. Chairman and Coloradons: The Washington Monument is the expression in stone of an undivided national sentiment reaching back to the days of seventy-six and woven into the fabric of American institutions. It typifies the reverence of a great people for the name and their gratitude for the achievements of their most illustrious character. Like the man whose name it bears, its outlines are massive and its proportions majestic. The materials which compose its external structure are uniform and symbolize the structure of the Union. Those which crowd the recesses of its interior are contributed by the several States and represent the distinctive Commonwealths clustering beneath and supporting the shield of the great Republic. It is more than a monument to the memory of a man; it is the towering emblem of the American Government, a sisterhood of States 'distinct as the waves but one as the sea.'

"To-day we of Colorado are gathered at the shrine of Washington to present to the Nation her contribution to his memory. From her varied and exhaustless mountain stores the Centennial State has chosen a block of marble hewn from a Gargantuan quarry, squared to the shape of her own dimensions, white as the driven snow, and solid as the fame of the man to which it is now dedicated. The love which her people bear to his memory, their loyalty to the cause he so signally vindicated, their devotion to the land whose independence he secured and of which she is now a part, their zeal for the institutions which his valor secured, all these are embodied in this offering.

"Colorado is herself a monument along the pathway of the Nation's life. Her Territorial government was forged in the fires of the Civil War and thrown upon the western frontier as a bulwark against Indian aggression. Right valiantly did she defend the outpost. She acquired her statehood in 1876, the centennial year of the Republic. Her domain was acquired from France, from Texas, and from Mexico, by treaty, by cession, and by conquest. One of her rivers marks the northernmost reach of Spanish dominion, from which it retreated before the aggressions of the Anglo-Saxon. She spreads over the roof tree of the continent, and the melting snows of her mountains feed alike the streams of the Atlantic and Pacific slopes. The walls of her southwestern canyons are crowded with the ruins of a prehistoric civilization that was old when Egypt was without her pyramids. Her mountains dwarf the pinnacles of the Alps; her vast plains have been wrested from the solitude of the desert, and yield abundant harvests to a thriving and industrious yeomanry. Her people are descendants of the pioneers. They were drawn to her borders by the lure of gold and silver, by a soil, a sky, and an atmosphere whose blended glories eclipse the sunlit climate and fertile slopes of the Riviera. They hold their heritage as a trust for posterity. They have their problems, but confront them undaunted and unafraid. They have their trials, but will emerge from them purified as by fire. They are Americans all—bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh, inspired by the same aspirations, professing the same faith, and prepared when the need shall demand it to make common sacrifice to preserve and perpetuate what Washington with his Continentals wrested from the reluctant hands of kingly power.

"Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the people of Colorado, in the name of the Centennial State, born on the hundredth anniversary of the American Union, beginning her expansive and ever-expanding career under every auspicious omen, I present to the people of the United States this tablet as a tribute of our affection, our loyalty, and our devotion to the Father of his Country."

Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson, United States Army, retired, as a member of the Washington National Monument Society, accepted the tablet on behalf of the people of the United States.

Gen. Wilson in his remarks called attention to the fact that he was present at the laying of the corner stone of the Monument on July 4, 1848, when the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, delivered the formal oration; and that he was also present at the dedication of the monument on February 21, 1885, when the Hon. Robert C Winthrop prepared the oration which was read in the House of Representatives by Hon. John D. Long, of Massachusetts.

Gen. Wilson was Chief of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, and in charge of the monument at the time of its dedication, and superintended the final work of completion. He also superintended the insertion in the walls of the Monument of the many memorial tablets that have been presented by various States, and he gave an interesting history of the construction of the Monument, and paid a beautiful tribute to the Centennial State.

The following addresses were then delivered:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JOHN F. SHAFROTH.

"Mr. Chairman, the tablet we unveil to-day was taken from a quarry in Colorado the extent of which is not equaled anywhere in the world. The deposit is not a quarry, but consists of a series of huge mountains composed of solid white marble 99.97 pure. The industry promises to become one of the greatest of its kind on earth. That marble is now being sold all over the United States and as far as Australia and New Zealand. It has been used for the interior finish of the great 26-story municipal building in New York City and of some of the large buildings in every city in the Union. It has been used for the construction of the new post-office building in Denver, which has been pronounced the most beautiful and artistic edifice in the United States, and has been selected over many competitors as the material from which to construct the great Lincoln Memorial at the Nation's Capital. It is likely to become one of the fine sculptural marbles of the world.

"But this is only one of the resources of Colorado.

"The Geological Survey at Washington estimates that we have within the limits of our Commonwealth 371,000,000,000 tons of coal, sufficient to supply the world at the present rate of consumption for 300 years.

"The Reclamation Service has estimated that the mountain streams of Colorado, through water-power plants, are capable of generating 2,117,000 horsepower and transmitting the same to our large towns and cities for commercial uses. As there is now being manufactured from each horsepower generated in the United States products of the value, on the average, of $1,142 each year, the possibility of output from this resource in Colorado, if we utilize the power to the same advantage, will equal $2,417,641,000 a year. As the amount expended for labor in the manufacture of the products of each horsepower is, on the average, $548 a year, there is a possibility in our State of ultimately having from this resource a pay roll for wages of $1,160,116,000 a year. We are therefore destined to become one of the greatest manufacturing States in the Union.

"We have in our Commonwealth about 4,000,000 acres of irrigated lands. Egypt has about the same amount and supports therefrom 9,000,000 people. As the yield per acre is about 50 per cent more than from lands in humid climates, and as the duty of water by economic use is becoming greater each year, the possibilities of the agricultural resources of our State, when all our flood waters are conserved, can hardly be estimated.

"Colorado has produced from her mines more than $1,000,000,000 of the precious metals. We who live there know that there are many Leadvilles, Aspins, Cripple Creeks, and Creedes yet undiscovered. We further know that by cheapening processes of extraction and treatment our production from low-grade ores will be almost unlimited. Besides we have large deposits of copper, zinc, lead, pitch blend, and carnolite ores.

"Our mountains will always be the grazing lands for our cattle. With $75,000,000 now invested by our citizens in that business, our State will always rank high in that industry.

"While Colorado is destined to become great in all these lines of industry, it is sure to always attract a large population of rich and well-to-do people on account of its almost eternal sunshine and health-giving climate.

"The tourist travel yields an income to Switzerland sufficient to support most of its population of 3,000,000 people. Colorado is seven times as large as that Republic and its scenery is more magnificent and grand. More and more each year her mountains, plateaus, and canyons are becoming the playground of America.

"It is said that the birthplace of liberty is in the highlands and mountains of the world. As expressed by Drake:

"When Freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night
And set the stars of glory there.

"It is therefore fitting that a liberty-loving people from the crest of the continent should have a tablet in the monument dedicated to the memory of the man who sacrificed so much that his country might be free."

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN H. H. SELDOMRIDGE.

"Mr. Chairman, the thoughts which come to us on this occasion are inspiring and uplifting. In this presence we open the temple of the mind and give entrance to characters and events of potent force in American history. As the years go by and yield their product of national growth and development we think more impressively of those who, under the providence of God, gave this Nation being and laid broad and deep the foundations of constitutional government.

"The strength and majesty of this beautiful shaft are but symbolic of the enduring principles of freedom, justice, and equality which underlie our civic structure. We gladly welcome every occasion which serves to remind us of these fundamentals of national faith, and we summon ourselves to renewed consecration in supporting and defending those agencies which seek to perpetuate and develop them.

"While we rejoice in this privilege of patriotic recollection we must not lose the lessons it should bring us. As we look upon this national memorial can we not in some measure put into our life and thought some portion of the spirit and self-sacrifice that controlled the life of Washington? As we think of his patriotism, his courage, his patience, and his unselfishness must we not confess that we have fallen far short of the standard that guided his life and determined his attitude toward his fellow countrymen?

"When we see on every side the striving for power and place; when we realize the strength of the forces at work to dominate and control functions of government for selfish purposes; when we hear the discordant murmurings of those who are not in sympathy with American institutions we must invoke the presence of the same patriotic spirit that found expression in Washington and other fathers of the Republic.

"We are in touch this morning with one of our great national shrines. We have come in thought and purpose to make an offering on behalf of the people of our beloved Commonwealth. We have brought this piece of Colorado marble to place it in familiar association with similar contributions from other States, and thus share with them in actual presence the honor and power of this memorial shaft.

"We not only here establish in symbol this bond of physical unity, but behind these tablets and stones there is the more enduring bond of civil unity. There is national vitality in this thought of statehood participation in honoring the life and achievements of Washington. All share the reward of his patriotism. His honor and fame belong to the youngest as well as to the oldest Commonwealth.

"We are not adding to the strength or beauty of this monument by this contribution but we are placing our State and her people into vital fellowship with other States in this noble and patriotic enterprise. As we dedicate this Colorado stone to the place assigned to it in this structure let us pray that there may come upon our people and those of other States as well such an inrush of patriotic feeling and purpose that the spirit of Washington may live and breathe anew in all our borders.

"Colorado modestly, yet proudly, claims the honor of this occasion. As her representatives we pledge her citizenship to the observance of every national obligation and their consecration to every national endeavor."

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN GEORGE J. KINDEL.

"Mr. Chairman, on this auspicious occasion, Colorado Day celebration, and the dedication of Colorado marble slab, which is the purest and finest grained on earth, and now a part of the greatest monument on earth, I am reminded of Thomas Jefferson, who said that 'agriculture, manufacture, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of prosperity, are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise.'

"Without the success of the above, art, religion, science, and so forth, are of no avail.

"The matchless and inexhaustible wealth of Colorado in addition to sunshine, scenery, and health-producing atmosphere, have been matters of interest and attraction to the people of all parts of the world. Fortune seekers and fortune multipliers have found here a lucrative field for operation, until law and order was ignored, and anarchy prevailed, such as we have suffered for the past 12 months. Nowhere, and at no time, to my knowledge, has the Government restricted the development of industries as is now being done in Colorado, obviously at the behest of labor agitators, which is much deplored and criticized.

"What we pray for and are entitled to is law and order, fair transportation rates, and a square deal to all—labor and capital alike.

"Therefore, I conclude with Holland's lines, which I have repeated over a hundred thousand times:

"God give us men. The time demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and willing hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And dam his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

"In corroboration of my statement concerning conditions in Colorado, I want to read a telegram which I received this morning, as follows:

"DENVER, COLO., July 31, 1914.

"Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

"The restrictions of the War Department in regard to employment of labor and the fine line drawn makes it impossible for us to secure men sufficient to get on a working basis, whereby we sustain nothing but losses. Many men come into our Denver office, voluntarily seeking employment, but they lack money for transportation to the mine. They are willing that the railroad fare should be deducted from their first two weeks' pay, and will go to the mine unaccompanied. These men apply for work voluntarily and unsolicited, but according to the ruling of the officer in command of the Government troops at Trinidad, we can not take them on. If they apply to the superintendent at the mine, it is considered regular, but we can not employ labor at our headquarters in Denver and advance transportation. The fact that these men reimburse us for this advanced transportation at the end of two weeks' time, practically amounts to their paying their own fare, and as our mine is 12½ miles from Walsenburg, is it fair for a man to go that distance and voluntarily make application for work. Before he can get there he is beset by union pickets, and every influence used to turn him back. Our principal operations are in Denver, and when men voluntarily apply here, we think that we should be permitted to send them to the mine. Can you assist us in clearing up this point?

"THE SUNSHINE COAL MINING CO.,
"By W. F. OAKES, President."

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN EDWARD KEATING.

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I came here this morning to attend a birthday party—Colorado's birthday party. Naturally I did not anticipate that the harmony of the proceedings would be disturbed by the raven-like croakings of the calamity howler. It is unfortunate that my colleague from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] has seen fit to refer to the domestic difficulties which have plagued our State during the last year, and it is especially unfortunate that in referring to those difficulties he has seen fit to be so intemperate in the expression of his views.

"Mr. Chairman, the gentleman would have you believe that the law is not being enforced in Colorado and that order is not being maintained. The gentleman's statement is without foundation, for, thanks to President Wilson, law and order reign within the borders of Colorado. Not a lopsided law and order, not the kind of law and order which protects one man and punishes another, but the law and order which recognizes neither race nor creed nor class, the law and order which bears as heavily on the rich man as on the poor man. In a word, Mr. Chairman, the kind of law and order guaranteed to us by the Constitution and laws of the land.

"I want to take this occasion to say that I unequivocally indorse what President Wilson has done in Colorado. He responded to what was well-nigh a unanimous appeal from our people, and the administrative officers under him have won the respect and admiration of our people by the way they have handled a most trying situation.

"It is very unfortunate when any man, especially a man in public life, loses his sense of proportion and fails to longer recognize the eternal fitness of things. When a man gets in that condition he is very apt to permit his idea, his hobby, his prejudice, to blind him to everything else that is going on in this glorious old world of ours. That is the mental condition of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL]. He reminds me very much of the country bumpkin who succeeded in persuading some girl to marry him and took her on a honeymoon trip to Niagara Falls. Under the direction of competent guides he was given an opportunity to view that masterpiece of nature, and when he returned to his accustomed place beside the stove in the village grocery his old cronies gathered around him and begged him to tell them something about the wonders of Niagara.

"'Tell us what impressed you most about Niagara Falls, Bill,' demanded one of his friends.

"Bill was lost in thought for several moments while he ransacked his brain to discover the one most impressive scene which he had been privileged to view during that marvelous trip. 'Well,' he said finally, 'I think the most impressive thing I saw at Niagara Falls was an Indian wearing a pair of red suspenders.'

"Now, the trouble with Bill was that he had lost his sense of proportion, and that is the trouble with the gentleman from Colorado. He does not seem to understand that it is shockingly bad taste to disturb the gayety of a birthday party with a bitter and inaccurate recital of the troubles which disturb the tranquillity of our State.

"If he will just take his eyes off the red suspenders for a moment, he will be able to appreciate what a splendid Commonwealth we have in Colorado and how proud her sons should be to claim this glorious daughter of Columbia as their very own.

"I think of Colorado as a man thinks of his mother. I was only 5 years old when she first opened her arms to receive me, a fatherless lad. She fed me, she clothed me, she sheltered me, she taught me my letters, she indulged the whims and fancies of my youth, she gave me my first job, she opened the portals of an honorable profession for me and bade me enter, and, while the responsibilities of middle age still rested lightly on my shoulders, she honored me with a commission to represent her in part in the most exalted legislative body on earth.

"Is it any wonder that I love Colorado?

"The very mention of her name makes me homesick. Van Dyke must have had Colorado in mind when, finding himself marooned in Europe, he wrote the lines:

"Oh, its home again and home again,
America for me;
I want a ship that's westward bound
To plough the rolling sea
To the blessed land of Room Enough
Beyond the ocean bars,
Where the air is full of sunshine
And the flag is full of stars."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, does the roll call develop a quorum?

The SPEAKER. On the roll call 205 gentlemen, not a quorum, have answered to their names. Two have come in since, and the Speaker could count himself, and that would reduce the minus quantity to 9.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I can get the House to pass a motion to send for the absentees. It is Saturday afternoon, and I suppose the best thing I can do is to move that the House do now adjourn. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, August 3, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of Labor, transmitting a report upon the Federal workman's compensation act of May 30, 1908, covering the first five complete years of its operation (H. SENATE.

MONDAY, August 3, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of nations, we thank Thee for our blessings. We thank Thee for our domestic peace and for the encouraging status of our relations with other nations. Standing where we are, amidst the mercies of God, we are emboldened to pray for the peace of the world. Grant that there may be a tranquil adjustment of difficulties among the nations abroad. May peace and prosperity and commercial enterprise be established and maintained everywhere and may our influence and example be such as to favor righteousness to the ends of the earth. We ask it in the name of Christ the Lord. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, July 27, 1914, was read and approved.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO (S. DOC. NO. 561).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, July 28, 1914.

MY DEAR SIR: On July 20, in response to Senate resolution of July 16, I forwarded to you copy of telegram from Admiral Badger, giving the result of the investigation ordered by this department on the 9th of July with reference to the publication by Mr. Fred L. Boalt and alleging that Ensign Richardson had put into practice the law of flight. In sending you copy of that telegram I stated that as soon as the full report had been received from the board it would be forwarded. I am sending herewith a full record of the proceedings of the board of inquiry convened on board the U. S. S. Texas at Vera Cruz, Mexico, by order of the commander in chief, to inquire into "the truth of certain allegations made by Fred L. Boalt, correspondent for the Newspaper Enterprise Association in Vera Cruz, relative to the shooting of certain prisoners by the naval forces of the United States during the occupation of Vera Cruz on or about April 22, 1914."

Very respectfully,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication and accompanying papers will lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS (S. DOC. NO. 560).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th ultimo, a statement of the balances remaining unexpended and available on June 30, 1914, to the credit of the respective river and harbor projects of the country now under improvement, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, submitting information of its official proceedings for the 10 months ended December 31, 1913, together with information relating to the regulation and operation of the public utilities in the District of Columbia coming under the jurisdiction of the commission. The report having already been printed, it will be referred without printing to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

BUSINESS OF RELIANCE BUGGY CO., ST. LOUIS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have read a communication from the president of the Reliance Buggy Co., of St. Louis, addressed to the president of the Business Men's League of St. Louis.

I feel that this is a time when business men ought to be busy, and I wish that the business men of the country could take some inspiration from the closing paragraph of the communication.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

RELIANCE BUGGY CO., VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS,
St. Louis, July 17, 1914.

Mr. SAM D. CAPEN,
President Business Men's League, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 15th requesting our opinion as to the advisability of a committee going to Washington to confer with the President of the United States on present business conditions and pending legislation:

First. We believe that this idea is being overworked, as Mr. Wilson is receiving and has received voluntary delegations daily, who have this one purpose in view.

While the President is willing and anxious to lay his views and to some extent his plans before the business men of the country and any others who may be interested, the sending of a committee to Washington without invitation from the President himself would not meet with our approval.

Taking up the questions contained in your letter:

1 and 2. We do not know whether business conditions are good or bad in St. Louis, as we do very little local business.

3. Our business has been pleasantly normal this season. We have just completed 10 months of our fiscal year with very satisfactory results so far. From our point of view, the feeling on the part of some business men that business is unsettled is not borne out by our own results. We are inclined to believe that a great deal of this calamity stuff is imaginary and mischievous.

6. If his business conditions are unsatisfactory to the business man, the most effective remedy is to dig in and remedy it. We stated in reply to question 3 that our business is pleasantly normal. We can truthfully add to that reply that our business is increased almost 20 per cent to date over last year, and we thought we produced our capacity the previous year. Sitting around dinner tables criticizing the Government, and the President in particular, on subjects the fundamentals of which we might know little about, did not bring about these results, but instead consistent work directed in the field we cover; and we are inclined to believe that this remedy is in the hands of every business man if he will pay less attention to the troubles of the railroads and leave the affairs of the Government in the hands of those who are placed there to look after them.

Yours, truly,

RELIANCE BUGGY CO.,
P. E. EBRENZ, Manager.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CATRON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12009) to correct the military record of James W. McGreevey, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 714) thereon.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 5705) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Elsie McCaulley from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Philadelphia, Pa., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 715) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13717) to provide for leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 716) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred Senate resolution 420, instructing the Secretary of War to ascertain if the waters of the Great Kanawha, Gauley, or New Rivers, in West Virginia, are being polluted, and if certain ore washings on the New River have been stopped, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which was agreed to.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5028) for the relief of Harry T. Herring, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 717) thereon.

EARL A. BANCROFT.

Mr. CLAPP. On behalf of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I beg to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 5798) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Lewis Bancroft from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Mantorville, Minn., and I submit a report (No. 713) thereon. The bill relates to the circumstance of the burial of a soldier in the District of Columbia, and the relatives in Minnesota ask permission to remove the remains. Under the law the Commissioners of the District of Columbia can not grant the privilege without the express authorization of Congress. To the relatives of the deceased soldier it is, of course, a matter of intense interest and concern, and I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the health officer of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Lewis Bancroft from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Mantorville, Minn.

Mr. CLAPP. The bill is recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in a letter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume that the person did not die of any contagious disease.

Mr. CLAPP. I assume it, certainly, in view of the recommendation. I had the bill referred to the commissioners and they recommend its passage.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, in line 5, before the name "Bancroft," to strike out "Lewis" and insert "Earl A."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Earl A. Bancroft from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Mantorville, Minn."

ELIZABETH P. DURFEE.

Mr. SHAFROTH, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 428, submitted by Mr. SMOOT on the 21st ultimo, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Elizabeth P. Durfee, widow of Benjamin Durfee, late messenger, United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral and all other expenses.

COMMITTEE ON CORPORATIONS ORGANIZED IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAFROTH, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 425, submitted on the 17th ultimo by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] for the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I report it back with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 5, to strike out "two weeks after" and insert "with," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to employ an additional stenographer at the rate of $100 per month, the term of service of such stenographer to conclude with the final adjournment of the second session Sixty-third Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOCIAL INSURANCE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) authorizing the President to accept an invitation and to appoint delegates to participate in the International Conference on Social Insurance, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Republic of France to the Government of the United States to be represented by delegates to the International Conference on Social Insurance to be held at Paris, France, in September, 1914, and to appoint delegates thereto: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of such delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator who reports the joint resolution whether the delegates will get to the conference by wireless? How do they propose to get together?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Connecticut has as accurate information on that subject as I have. The invitation has been extended, and I am authorized by the committee to report the joint resolution favorably and to ask for its immediate consideration. Whether the delegates will get to Paris in time to attend the convention I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when in the last administration the Secretary of State went to South America to try to promote and enlarge our commerce in that part of the world he went on a battleship. We did not have an American merchant marine steamship suitable to carry him there, so we sent him on a battleship. Of course we can send these delegates on battleships of the United States, and in that way we can demonstrate to the world the magnificent success we have had in building up the American merchant marine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah whether these delegates would have any moral right, or any other right, by going to this conference to bind this Government to send delegates to future congresses?

I will say that when the diplomatic appropriation bill was under consideration by the committee we found that almost countless commissions had been started in this way, and we have been making appropriations from year to year. We were told that when the delegates got together they would form an agreement or convention, under which each country was bound to pay a pro rata part of maintaining it, and that they were started very largely in this way by a resolution passed by Congress. I want to know whether there is anything likely to develop from this convention of that particular kind or not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think not. These conventions have been held from year to year for the past 15 years, and they are very useful. They are investigating the subject of workmen's compensation, old-age pensions, and a variety of things of that kind that the whole world is greatly interested in at present.

An arrangement has been made that the convention will be held in the United States next year. Of course, unless we accept the invitation and send delegates to the convention this year we can not very well ask the other Governments to send delegates to the convention next year. The joint resolution does not involve the Government in any expense whatever. Nothing has ever been appropriated heretofore for those delegates, and they have been meeting from year to year. There is not, in my judgment, the slightest probability that Congress will ever be called upon, either directly or indirectly, to expend a dollar for this purpose.

Mr. JONES. If the convention is to be held in this country next year, does the Senator think Congress will be called upon to make an appropriation for the entertainment of the convention?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress has already made an appropriation for that purpose. As I recall, an appropriation of $10,000 was made toward defraying the expenses of that convention. That has already been arranged for.

Mr. JONES. That has already been taken care of. Then, I simply invite the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to this proposition, because he is pretty familiar with the situation, as it relates to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Washington has called attention to the situation which has grown up in this country during the last 20 years. At The Hague to-day the United States has half a dozen bureaus, to the maintenance of which we are contributing, at very large expense to this Government. We have a bureau in Rome which is the outgrowth of a convention of this kind held abroad. Following conventions of this character, it is frequently concluded that we ought to establish a permanent bureau at The Hague. We undertook to abolish, and we did abolish, half a dozen of such bureaus; but where Congress on behalf of the United States has accepted invitations, and other Governments have accepted them, we have felt, at the suggestion of the Secretary of State, that we were bound to appropriate the money to continue many bureaus established abroad. We know nothing about their employees; whether they are Englishmen or Americans, we do not know; yet in every appropriation bill we appropriate money to maintain such bureaus, some half dozen of which, I repeat, have been established merely as the result of resolutions which have been passed by Congress similar to the one now pending.

I am not going to oppose this joint resolution, but I think notice ought to be given that we do not intend to appropriate any more money to provide for the maintenance of bureaus in Rome or in Switzerland or anywhere else. If such notice were given, we would not be called upon to make appropriations for this purpose hereafter, and I think notice ought to be given now that no more of these bureaus to which we are contributing will be established, but that they will be abolished. So far as I am concerned, I expect to request the Secretary of State to call attention to the fact that the United States Government does not intend to encourage these bureaus abroad.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, this joint resolution expressly provides that no appropriation shall be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah why this joint resolution does not take the usual course of being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The joint resolution has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OVERMAN. And reported favorably from that committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the Committee on Foreign Relations has made a favorable report on the joint resolution. That is what I have presented.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey object to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No, Mr. President. It seems to me this would be a very fitting and proper time to promote social intercourse and social insurance on the other side of the water; and I think an objection on my part to the consideration of the joint resolution would come with very ill grace at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUVENIR COINS OF PANAMA-PACIFIC EXPOSITION.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. From the Committee on Industrial Expositions I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6039) for the coinage of certain gold and silver coins in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined at the United States mint at San Francisco not exceeding 2,000 gold coins of the denomination of $50 each, 10,000 gold coins of the denomination of $2.50 each, 25,000 gold coins of the denomination of $1 each, and not exceeding 200,000 silver coins of the denomination of 50 cents each, all of legal weight and fineness; said coins to be struck in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. The words, devices, and designs upon said coins shall be determined and prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and all provisions of law relative to the coinage and legal-tender value of all other gold and silver coins shall be applicable to the coins issued under and in accordance with the provisions of this act; and one-half of the issue of $50 gold coins herein authorized shall be similar in shape to the octagonal $50 gold pieces issued in California in 1851; and the entire issue of said $50, $2.50, and $1 coins herein authorized shall be sold and delivered by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. at par, under rules and regulations and in amounts to be prescribed by him, the delivery of said coins to begin not later than December 1, 1914. Said 50-cent coins herein authorized shall be issued only upon the request of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co., and shall be delivered to it by the Secretary of the Treasury, at par, during the period when said Panama-Pacific International Exposition shall be officially open.

SEC. 2. That medals and diplomas, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said Panama-Pacific International Exposition and of the awards to be made to the exhibitors thereat, shall be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury at the United States mint at Philadelphia and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, said medals and diplomas to be delivered to said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. subject to the provisions of section 52 of the coinage act of 1873 and upon payment of the cost of the material composing said medals or diplomas.

SEC. 3. That the 50-cent silver coins herein authorized may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be coined or finished and issued from the machinery to be installed as a part of the exhibit of the United States mint at said exposition, and for the purpose of maintaining the exhibit as an educative working exhibit at all times the coins so minted may be remelted and reminted. All of said 50-cent silver coins herein authorized not issued to and at the request of said Panama-Pacific International Exposition, whether the same are coined as a part of said working exhibit or coined at the mint in San Francisco, shall be remelted upon the official closing of said exposition. All provisions hereof in regard to the coinage, finishing, or issue of said 50-cent silver coins from machinery installed as a part of the said exhibit shall be coined, finished, and issued under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared a suitable souvenir medal (of such metal or composition of metals as he may prescribe), to be struck off by the machinery in said mint exhibit, and all of said medals shall be delivered to said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. upon payment of the cost of the material composing the same, and all other souvenirs which may be coined, stamped, printed, or otherwise issued from any portion of the United States Government exhibit shall be delivered to said exposition company upon payment of the cost of the material composing said souvenirs, and said souvenir medals and other souvenirs shall be delivered to said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. subject to such regulations as to disposition thereof as the Government exhibit board may prescribe. All provisions, whether penal or otherwise, or the laws prohibiting the counterfeiting or imitating of coins or securities of the United States shall apply to the medals, diplomas, and souvenirs provided for under sections 2 and 3 of this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to obtain suitable designs for the coins and medals herein authorized, and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the cost of said designs.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I inquire from what committee has the bill been reported?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The bill was referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the report from that committee a unanimous one?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is practically a unanimous report, as all of the members of the committee who were present voted in favor of reporting the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it seems to me the bill ought to have been referred either to the Committee on Finance or to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It involves——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to say, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Treasury has warmly approved the bill, and it has been indorsed and recommended by all Senators, I believe, who are present in the Senate. It is founded on the precedents established in connection with other expositions when similar action was taken. Further than that, there can be no loss to the Government. The Panama-Pacific Exposition bids fair to be the grandest industrial exposition our country has ever seen. The time is exceedingly short in which to secure fitting and appropriate designs to commemorate the work, and hence your committee have deemed it wise to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I realize the importance of the exposition, and I have no objection to the substance of the bill. The objection I have is that the subject matter covered by the bill was referred to a committee which I do not believe has any jurisdiction over it; but I shall not object now to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thank the Senator. Of course, I would not attempt to argue the question as to the wisdom of the bill having been referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions, but the Senate in its wisdom made that reference, and the Secretary of the Treasury has approved the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will inquire if this is not copied from bills of similar character which have been passed in reference to other expositions?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is almost identical with them.

The Vice PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL DRY-FARMING CONGRESS.

Mr. STONE. I report back favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) authorizing the President to extend invitations to other nations to send representatives to the International Dry-Farming Congress, to be held at Wichita, Kans., October 7 to 17, inclusive, 1914.

I am directed by the committee to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. I will say in order that Senators may be advised before the request for unanimous consent is submitted, that the joint resolution relates to the very interesting and important subject of dry farming, in which sections of the arid and semiarid West are interested, and some Senators from those sections desire to have the measure acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read:

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to extend invitations to other nations to appoint delegates or representatives to the International Dry-Farming Congress, to be held at Wichita, Kans., October 7 to 17, inclusive, 1914: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted for the expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with the said congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if there has not already been an appropriation made for this dry-farming congress?

Mr. THOMPSON. A small appropriation has been made to enable the Government to make an exhibit there, that appropriation being carried in the general agricultural appropriation bill; but nothing has been appropriated pertaining to the expenses of the delegates to be appointed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that if there is any claim made against the Government, because of the invitation extended, I shall oppose it with all the power I have. It is because of such invitations as the one extended in the joint resolution that year in and year out claims have been presented to the Committee on Appropriations. Although resolutions of this character in the past have specifically stated that there was no appropriation to be made, claims have been made against the Government and pressed here by the department, and we have felt under obligations to pay them. So, in connection with other members of the Appropriations Committee, I wish to give notice at this time, that, so far as paying expenses incurred under this resolution is concerned, I shall never consent to it so long as I have a vote in this body.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, while I am not a member of the Appropriations Committee, I entirely concur in what the Senator from Utah has said with respect to the matter. If I should happen to have the good fortune to be in the Senate at any time in the future when a claim may be presented growing out of this resolution, I will join him in opposing it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but the trouble about all these matters is that, although they are couched in simple and definite language, yet Senators come before our committee, supported by recommendations of the Secretary of State, and seek appropriations, notwithstanding the specific language of the law enacted by Congress. Therefore I think the Senator from Utah is eminently right in having given the notice.

Mr. THOMPSON. I can assure the Senate that, so far as the Senator from Kansas is concerned, there will never be any claim for an appropriation on account of representation at the dry-farming congress. The resolution expressly provides that no appropriation of any kind shall be made for this purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. They all do that.

Mr. THOMPSON. And there is none intended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES NAVY MAIL LINES.

Mr. THORNTON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5259) to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America, and I submit a report (No. 718) thereon, together with the accompanying document, being the opinion of the Navy Department on the question. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 5259) to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines, by employing such vessels of the Navy as in his discretion are available, without impairment to the paramount duties of the Navy, and as are necessary and appropriate, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining regular communication between the east or west coast, or both coasts, of the United States and either or both coasts of South America. The vessels so employed shall carry United States mail, passengers, and freight under such regulations and at such rate or rates as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. Such civilians, such officers of the naval auxiliary service, and such officers and enlisted men of the Navy, including officers on the retired list, as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary shall be employed in the business of the said mail line or lines and retired officers of the Navy so employed at sea or on shore shall in all respects be held and considered to be in an active-duty status and shall receive the pay and allowances of officers of the active list of the same rank and length of service: Provided, That officers placed on the retired list on account of wounds or disability incident to the service, or on account of age, or after 30 years' service shall not be ordered to such duty without their consent.

The enlisted strength of the Navy, as now or hereafter authorized by law, is hereby increased by the number of men required to man the vessels so employed, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist such number of men in the Navy for such terms of enlistment, not to exceed four years, as may be desirable, and to distribute the number of men so enlisted among the various ratings of the Navy.

SEC. 2. That in addition to and as a part of the line of the Navy there is hereby established an active reserve list. Line officers placed on the active reserve list under the provisions of this act shall be held to be in an active-duty status in all respects, except that officers on the active reserve list shall not be advanced on the active reserve list except for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism, when their advancement thereon for these causes shall be governed by the provisions of law governing the advancement of officers on the active list for like causes. All laws now in effect with reference to the retirement of officers from the active list are hereby extended to include officers on the active reserve list.

SEC. 3. That sections 8 and 9 of the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," as amended by the act approved August 22, 1912, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," are so far amended that officers who hereafter volunteer or are selected for retirement as therein provided shall be held and considered to have volunteered for transfer to the active reserve list or shall be selected for transfer to the active reserve list, respectively; and the transfer of such officers to the active reserve list in lieu of their retirement shall be made subject to the restrictions imposed by the provisions of the said sections as amended.

SEC. 4. That in addition to such part of existing appropriations as may be available for the expenses of operating the line or lines herein provided for the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of organizing, inaugurating, and carrying on the traffic provided for in this act and in defraying the operating expenses incident thereto: Provided, That all money received for the transportation of mail, passengers, and freight, as provided in section 1 of this act, and for such other services as may be incident to the operation of the said line or lines, is hereby made available, in addition to the aforesaid sum of $100,000 herein appropriated, for expenses incident to the proper conduct of the business contemplated in this act: Provided further, That any sum of money herein appropriated which remains unexpended at the end of the third fiscal year after the passage of this act, and at the end of each fiscal year thereafter, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Louisiana what class of ships in the Navy will be available for this service at the present time?

Mr. THORNTON. I will answer that there is a full report from the department covering the question, and I think perhaps it would be better to have it read, so that the Senator will understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have not an adequate auxiliary Navy. We had not enough ships to accompany our battleship fleet around the world. I can not quite see what ships we are going to utilize without seriously weakening our meager auxiliary fleet.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the author of the bill is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], and I think probably he would like to answer any question which the Senator asks; so I will ask him to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, for the information of the Senator, the list of ships that the department says can be used.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should be glad to have that done.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 11, 1914.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: 1. Referring to Senate resolution No. 317, Sixty-third Congress, second session, I have the honor to forward to your committee a report embodying the information requested.

2. It is practicable, by the use of naval vessels, to carry out the purpose indicated in the resolution, and the following vessels will be available for the service, viz, St. Louis, Charleston, Milwaukee, Columbia, Minneapolis, Salem, Chester, Buffalo, Rainbow, Ancon, Cristobal, Hector, Mars, Vulcan, Cyclops, and Neptune (or two equally good), and the Nanshan.

3. The St. Louis, Charleston, Milwaukee, Columbia, and Minneapolis are fast cruisers; the Salem and Chester are fast scout cruisers; the Buffalo and Rainbow are transports; the Ancon and Cristobal are steamers employed by the Panama Railroad Co. to be turned over to the Navy Department; and the others are naval colliers.

4. The cruisers are suitable for carrying only a small number of male passengers—15 to 20 each—and could not be fitted for carrying bulky freight without interfering materially with their military value; but they could carry the mails and a limited amount of express freight and parcels, about 150 tons each.

5. The Buffalo, Rainbow, Ancon, and Cristobal are suitable for carrying a limited number of passengers and any kind of freight: Buffalo, 20 first-class passengers and 4,000 tons of freight; Rainbow, 25 passengers and 2,500 to 3,000 tons of freight; Ancon and Cristobal each 74 first class and 32 steerage passengers and between 10,000 and 11,000 tons of freight. The naval colliers are not suitable for carrying any passengers, but are well adapted to a freight service; the first three carrying 6,500 to 10,000 tons each; the two of the Cyclops class 10,000 to 12,500 tons of freight and 2,900 tons of fuel oil in bulk each; and the Nanshan about 3,000 tons.

* * * * * * *

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I may add to the statement from the department that there are carried on the Navy list, under the head of "fuel ships," 22 vessels having a total displacement of something like 230,000 tons, varying in size from 6,000 to 19,000 tons. Many of these ships are in active service in connection with the fleet, but they would be available for any service of the character outlined in this bill, if it is passed, provided the fleet were not in actual service on the Mexican coast.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Just a word.

Mr. President, this is a makeshift that perhaps we ought to agree to. It is a deplorable fact that our mails to South America, including the official mail, are sent to Europe and transshipped from there to South America, covering 6,000 instead of 3,000 miles by direct line. I can not help saying, however, that it is a makeshift of which we ought not to be proud.

This question of steamship service to South America has been agitated a great deal. I have agitated it myself. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has agitated it. Presidents of the United States have agitated it. Both Republican and Democratic statesmen have agitated it. Yet we are without a line from either the Gulf, the Pacific, or the Atlantic coast of the United States to South America.

This bill proposes to put in service a few inadequate ships, if we can spare them from other service; ships that will carry a handful of passengers and a little freight; slow ships, I take it, almost every one of them; and we are to be put in competition with the great countries of the world, with their magnificent steamships, by calling together this conglomeration of third-class or fourth-class ships for this service.

I shall not oppose it, because I think if we can do anything to give us a chance in the markets of South and Central America, we ought to do it; but I can not refrain from saying that it is almost a tragedy that this great country of ours, in its rivalry with these other nations in the effort to secure trade, should be compelled to be handicapped by a fleet, even if we can muster them, of ships that are so inferior and so poorly prepared for the service to which we call them.

As I say, I shall not oppose the passage of the bill; but I shall not vote for it with the sense of gratification and pleasure that I would if it were a proposition to establish a line of steamships that would be a credit to the Government between the North Atlantic coast or the Gulf coast of this country and South America.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the immediate pressing importance of maintaining our mail connections with Central and South America is apparent, and the difficulty of doing so in the way heretofore followed, at least in so far as many foreign mail-carrying vessels are concerned, is likewise apparent.

There can be no difference of opinion as to the importance of some legislation of this kind. This, however, is a bill covering more than one subject, and it is brought before the Senate so suddenly that we have little opportunity for examining or discussing it. I do not wish to object to its consideration, nor to oppose its passage; but I should like to know whether, in the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, any serious disadvantage would result if the consideration of the bill should be postponed for a day or two?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this bill results from a resolution which was considered by the Senate three or four months ago. The resolution went to the Navy Department. The purposes of the resolution were approved by the department, which prepared the bill which is now under consideration. It has not been on the calendar because of the difficulties of getting reports from committees, and because we were in a condition where possibly these ships would be needed in Mexican waters. In fact, many of them are on the coast of Mexico at this time; but apparently the time has passed when they are going to be needed for that service, and this is the first practicable opportunity the Naval Affairs Committee has had to consider the bill and to make a report.

If it were possible to have a morning hour every day when legislation of this kind could be considered, or if those who control the legislative program were willing to take up these matters, which I think are of immediate and pressing importance, and give them precedence over legislation which I think ought to be deferred until next winter, I should not feel like urging the Senator not to make an objection against this bill; but I think the sentiment of those who have thought of this legislation and its purposes has been unanimously in favor of the adoption of this proposition. Unless we are going to have an immediate opportunity to discuss it, and to discuss it fully, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection.

Mr. STONE. I have not made any objection.

Mr. WEEKS. No; I understand the Senator has not.

Mr. STONE. And it is not my purpose to object. I simply submit a question to the Senator who is the author of the bill, according to the statement of the Senator from Louisiana.

As to the unfinished business before the Senate, and the bills associated with it, which it is generally understood are to be considered at this session, should be postponed to another session of Congress, that is a question that I do not care now to discuss. We have been over that time and again, and it would be a waste of time. I think, expressing my own opinion only, that in the face of the almost world-wide conditions of tumult now prevailing, and which unhappily we have every reason to believe will be intensely accentuated, any question of this character of such grave international moment could by practically unanimous consent find time for consideration. I do not mean by that there will be need for any undue postponement of the consideration of the trade commission bill or the Clayton bill or any other; but between times it may become necessary, it is very likely that it will become necessary, for the Senate to take up questions like that involved in the pending bill and dispose of them. The public interest and welfare may absolutely require that to be done.

I express the view that there will be no serious difficulty about that. I am informed that a measure is likely to be introduced at an early day in the House of Representatives intended to meet the needs of our commerce arising under the circumstances confronting us. If that measure shall be introduced and come before Congress, I have no doubt it will embrace such matters as are covered by this bill, and which measure as a whole will, I take it, be very much broader and more comprehensive than this measure. If that is true and the attention of Congress is to be directed to a measure of that kind, it occurs to me it might be better to embrace all these questions in one measure rather than to take them up piecemeal.

Mr. President, I simply make that as a suggestion, having no intention, however, of obstructing the passage of the pending bill if it is thought best to proceed with it at this time.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator this question: Even if his supposition is correct, and the press reports indicate that it is, does not the Senator think it might facilitate the action of the House if the Senate had passed this bill which going to the House then might be incorporated, or such part as had value, in the general proposition to which he refers?

Mr. STONE. That might be true; possibly it is true. Before the bill pending is disposed of, if there should be no objection to its consideration, I think it is due to the Senate that the Senator from Massachusetts should, as concisely and briefly as he can, state the general provisions of the bill, so the Senate may be better informed when it comes to vote upon it.

In concluding, Mr. President, I wish to make this observation: I sympathize with what the Senator from New Hampshire has said. With him, I think that the situation confronting us at this time is one that we not only have no reason to be proud of, but one that we might very well be heartily ashamed of. With almost the whole of Europe involved, or about to become involved, in a tremendous conflict, which may be prolonged, resulting almost inevitably in seriously crippling all, and, maybe, destroying many, of their industries, there must of necessity in the near future be a very great demand upon the resources of this country, agricultural and manufacturing, not only in Europe, but in other parts of the world. Mr. President, a very large commerce has been carried on for years between the South American States and Europe, an immense volume of European productions being sold in the markets of South America, and their respective products have been exchanged in great quantities, and so it seems to me that one manifest effect of this great struggle in Europe will be not only to interrupt, but for an indefinite period to put an end to commercial communication between South America and the great marts of the manufacturing countries of Europe. Without any fault of ours a most opportune time has arisen for the United States to render a great public service and at the same time to enlarge its commercial intercourse with the Republics of the south. But right at this point we are terribly embarrassed by a lack of transportation facilities. The only difference between the Senator from New Hampshire and me, if we came to discuss the subject, which I shall not do now, would arise as to the causes blamable for this condition. It would boot nothing for us to enter upon a discussion of that kind at this time. Whatever the Senator's opinion may be as to the causes, or whatever mine may be, or that of any other Senator, we will all be agreed that by reason of the lack of a merchant marine we face at this time a most unfortunate if not desperate condition in the commercial world.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that I am very anxious to proceed with the trade commission bill, but I realize that this is a matter of great importance——

Mr. GALLINGER. Of greater importance.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I would be glad to expedite it, if it can be passed during the morning hour.

I wish to say, Mr. President, in this connection that for many years I have been urging, in the form of resolutions and amendments to pending legislation and bills, the creation of an auxiliary Navy, composed of transports, colliers, scouts, and other ships, which would aid the fighting ships in case of war and would be useful in time of peace in opening up new routes of commerce and as training schools for our merchant marine. This bill is not so ambitious as the project contemplated by the resolutions and amendments which I have offered from time to time, but I regard it as a step in that direction. It is a utilization by the Navy of certain ships now in the Navy for the purpose of opening up commercial routes and mail routes, new routes of transportaton through which American commerce can be developed.

We all know that the great difficulty in establishing a merchant marine in the United States is, first, the initial cost of the ships, which, under our protective system, is much larger than that in other countries; and, second, the cost of operation, because of the more liberal wages which we pay. But it is perfectly apparent that, so far as our Navy is concerned, it is a badly proportioned Navy, composed almost entirely of fighting ships and lacking the auxiliary ships necessary to support the fighting ships in case of war, and without the ability upon the part of the United States in case of war to call in the ships of its merchant marine, because, practically, we have no merchant marine.

I look upon this legislation, therefore, as a step in the direction of a larger policy, which will result in the construction by the United States of commercial ships, transports, colliers, ships that can be used for scouts, and so forth, in time of war and their utilization in time of peace; and I expect that in the progress of events the opening up of these commercial routes through our Navy will gradually lead to the establishment of a substantial merchant marine belonging to the United States.

I am warmly for this measure, and hope that no objection will be interposed against its present consideration.

I should like also to insert in my remarks the resolutions that I have offered and amendments that I have proposed on this subject during previous years, with extracts from previous remarks concerning them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Motion made by Mr. NEWLANDS, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, February 14, 1906:

That S. 529 be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, with instructions to report in connection therewith an estimate of the cost of the vessels required for service in the ocean mail lines provided for in section 6, and as to whether it is practicable for the United States Government to construct such ships as a part of the Navy, supplementary to the war ships, to be used as colliers, transports, scouts, etc., in the emergency of war, and as to whether it is practicable to lease such ships to private corporations in times of peace for the service of the mail lines contemplated in section 6, and as to whether it is practicable to organize a naval reserve to be enlisted in the United States in the service of such ships whose wages shall be paid three-fourths by the private corporations leasing such ships, and one-fourth by the United States Government; such naval reserves to be composed of citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such—and to be subject to the training of naval officers in order to fit them to respond to the call of the Government in case of war, and the rentals received from such ships to form a fund for the gradual enlargement of the number of supplementary ships required by the Navy in case of war, as colliers, transports, scouts, etc., and generally to report the comparative cost of such method of enlarging our merchant marine as compared with the method of subvention provided by section 6.

Amendment to the ship subsidy bill, Sixtieth Congress, first session, offered by Mr. NEWLANDS on March 20, 1908:

That the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall hereafter constitute a commission to be known as the Foreign Commerce Commission, and that they are hereby authorized to provide for the construction, either in the private shipyards of the country or in the shipyards of the Navy, or both, of 27 vessels, not exceeding 6,500 tons capacity each and costing in the aggregate not exceeding $27,000,000; that such vessels shall be so constructed as to be useful to the Navy as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, colliers, dispatch boats, cruisers, and scouts, and also useful in times of peace in opening up new routes of commerce between United States ports and the ports of South America, New Zealand, Australia, and the Philippines; that such commission make to Congress such recommendations as to it seem advisable regarding the manning of such vessels in whole or in part by the Naval Reserve and the leasing of them so manned in times of peace to shipping companies for the purpose of promoting foreign trade and commerce, and for the incorporation of such shipping companies under national law, and for reports on their operations.

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWLANDS to the ship subsidy bill, Sixtieth Congress, first session, April 27, 1908:

For an auxiliary navy consisting of transports, colliers, scouts, dispatch boats, and other vessels necessary in aid of the fighting ships in case of war, $20,000,000, and the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the Postmaster General are hereby constituted a commission to recommend to Congress a plan for utilizing such ships in times of peace.

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWLANDS to the naval appropriation bill, Sixtieth Congress, second session, February 15, 1909:

Strike out the clause relating to battleships, page 68, lines 14 to 21, inclusive, and insert: "That for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Naval Establishment of the United States the President is authorized to have constructed such auxiliary ships, including transports, colliers, dispatch boats, cruisers, and scouts, as will be necessary in case of war to support the fighting ships, at a total cost not to exceed $12,000,000; and that the President make such recommendations to Congress as to him seem advisable regarding the manning of vessels belonging to such auxiliary navy, in whole or in part, by the Naval Reserve and the leasing of them so manned in times of peace to shipping companies for the purpose of promoting foreign trade and commerce."

In the Sixty-first Congress, second session, on June 10, 1910, Mr. NEWLANDS introduced S. 3721, to authorize the construction of auxiliary ships for the Navy:

A bill (S. 3721) providing for the construction of auxiliary ships of the Navy and for their use in times of peace in opening up new routes of commerce.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall hereafter constitute a commission to be known as the foreign commerce commission, and that they are hereby authorized to provide for the construction, either in the private shipyards of the United States or in the shipyards of the Navy, or both, of 30 vessels, not exceeding 6,500 tons capacity each and costing in the aggregate not exceeding $30,000,000; that such vessels shall be so constructed as to be useful to the navy as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, colliers, dispatch boats, cruisers, and scouts, and also useful in times of peace in opening up new routes of commerce between United States ports and the ports of South Africa, South America, New Zealand, Australia, and the Philippines; that such commission make to Congress such recommendation as to it seem advisable regarding the manning of such vessels in whole or in part by the Naval Reserve and the leasing of them so manned in times of peace to shipping companies for the purpose of promoting foreign trade and commerce, and the incorporation of such shipping companies under national law, and reports of their operation.

In the Sixty-first Congress, third session, on February 2, 1911, Mr. NEWLANDS offered the following as an amendment to the ship-subsidy bill:

That the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall hereafter constitute a commission to be known as the foreign commerce commission, and that they are hereby authorized to provide for the construction, either in the private shipyards of the United States or in the shipyards of the Navy, or both, of 30 vessels, not exceeding 6,500 tons capacity each and costing in the aggregate not exceeding $30,000,000; that such vessels shall be so constructed as to be useful to the Navy as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, colliers, dispatch boats, cruisers, and scouts, and also useful in times of peace in opening up new routes of commerce; that such commission make to Congress such recommendations as to it seem advisable regarding the manning of such vessels in whole or in part by the Naval Reserve and the leasing of them so manned in times of peace to shipping companies, or otherwise utilizing them for the purpose of promoting foreign trade and commerce.

Extract from Senate resolution No. 41, Sixty-second Congress, first session, introduced by Mr. NEWLANDS, May 11, 1911:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that during the extra session legislation should be enacted upon the following subjects:

* * * * * * *

(7) Providing for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine by free entry to American registry of all ships, wherever constructed, and by the construction of auxiliary ships for our Navy, to be used in time of war in aid of the fighting ships and in time of peace in establishing new routes of commerce through lease to shipping companies; such legislation to involve the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitute of auxiliary ships, with a view to the creation of a well-proportioned and self-sustaining Navy.

Extract from Senate resolution No. 159, offered by Mr. NEWLANDS, Sixty-second Congress, second session, December 7, 1911:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that during the present session the appropriate committees shall consider and Congress enact legislation upon the following subjects:

* * * * * * *

Twelfth. Providing for the construction of auxiliary ships for our Navy, to be used in time of war in aid of the fighting ships and in times of peace in establishing necessary service through the Panama Canal and new routes of commerce to foreign countries through lease to shipping companies; such legislation to involve the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitution of auxiliary ships, with a view to the creation of a well-proportioned and efficient Navy.

Extract from Senate resolution No. 4, introduced Sixty-third Congress, special session of the Senate, by Mr. NEWLANDS, on March 13, 1913:

6. Resolved, That the Committees on Military and Naval Affairs report at as early a date as possible during the extra session upon the following questions:

* * * * * * *

(b) A plan for the construction of auxiliary ships for the Navy, to be used in time of war in aid of the fighting ships and in time of peace in establishing necessary service through the Panama Canal and new routes of commerce to foreign countries through lease to shipping companies; such legislation involving the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitution of auxiliary ships with a view to the organization of a well-proportioned and efficient Navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I am not going to oppose any proposition that promises us any reasonable degree of relief. I have no apologies to make for my attitude on this great question of the merchant marine. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] wisely says this is not the time to discuss the causes which led to the decay of our merchant marine. The Senator and I have crossed swords before on that proposition. When the more comprehensive and, as I think, the more important bill that is promised us, according to the newspapers and in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, comes before the Senate I may have something to say on the general proposition. I have no disposition to say it now.

Mr. President, I have on my desk four speeches of greater or less importance, and probably of less importance rather than greater, which I have made in this Chamber, and I am gratified to observe that in those speeches, among other things, I called attention to two possible complications which might arise if we did not have an adequate merchant marine. One was that in the event of a great European war we would not have any ships to transport the products of our farms and our factories. Those are the words that I used. That is exactly the situation which confronts us at this very moment. The other suggestion I made was that in the event of a war between a great foreign nation and our Nation we would have no adequate auxiliary ships to supplement our battleship fleet, and that is exactly the situation which exists to-day.

This proposition takes some of the few auxiliary ships we have and puts them into commercial work, and if they can be called back to the Navy when they are needed no substantial harm, as I see it, will be done. But, as I said a moment ago, it is a pitiable situation; it is a pitiable proposition, considering the great emergency which is upon us. The Senator from Missouri properly says that this great war will interrupt trade between South America and the European countries. That is inevitable, and if we only had adequate steamship lines between the United States and South America, there would be a boom in American trade which would astonish not only our own people but the world. I have labored, in season and out of season, to have our country prepared for this very emergency, but I labored in vain.

If this makeshift can do some good, if it can accomplish something for American trade and American commerce, of course we ought all to agree to it; and I certainly shall vote for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Chair had asked if there was any objection to the passage of the bill, and I thought I had a right to the floor in my own name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not always correct. The Senator from Massachusetts had the floor and he has been yielding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will wait until the Senator from Massachusetts is through.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I should like to put into the RECORD without reading an article clipped from a New York paper of yesterday morning, from Mr. Lewis Nixon, in respect to this very situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OUTLINES WAY TO PROTECT COMMERCE OF AMERICA—LEWIS NIXON, STUDENT OF THE MERCHANT MARINE, SAYS PRESIDENT CAN ACT UNDER AMENDED PANAMA CANAL ACT TO PROVIDE NECESSARY VESSELS—EMERGENCY CALLS FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION.

Lewis Nixon, for 25 years one of the closest students of the American merchant marine and active in promoting its regeneration, presented yesterday a series of arguments to show what can be done in the present emergency to meet the imperative needs of American commerce, and to forestall another such predicament as now faces this country through lack of ocean shipping facilities.

He finds in the Panama Canal act full authority for action, and suggests that an amendment suspending during national emergencies the five-year limit placed by that law on purchase of foreign ships would place in the hands of the national administration the fullest opportunities to protect American foreign trade in supplying bottoms for its transportation and at the same time keep foreign ships out of the American coastwise trade, which they have sought for a generation to invade.

"In the past, when just such a contingency as now exists was suggested," Mr. Nixon said, "the idea was ridiculed. The United States can never be dependent upon her own ships, they said. It is better to have foreigners do our ocean carriage, because they can do it cheaper, was the argument.

"Naturally the foreign interests so well served by such sophistry keep their grinding hand upon legislation, and never permit any legislation favorable to American shipping to slip through. They got free ships in the foreign trade in the Panama Canal act. But they had to be available for governmental purposes in time of war, so as yet this has not been availed of.

UNDERWOOD BILL EMASCULATED.

"The Underwood bill as first drawn would have brought into play the successfully tried policy of discriminating duties, but this being seen, cunningly suggested changes caused the emasculation of its constructive features.

"A tremendous revival would have followed the earlier draft of the Panama Canal act as it passed the Senate, as this provided free tolls in the foreign trade; but the influence of foreign countries, exerted through those who profit by it here, had this changed in the House, and even free tolls in the coasting trade have now been given up.

"The pretext of war's reprisals in the Boer War put up freights and insurance in such way as to make our people pay largely for that war.

"A small section on the west coast paid more than $2,000,000 increase in freight and insurance rates on this account. A European Government would have called the influences that levied such tribute of us to sharp account, but we seem supine and helpless as soon as foreign transportation is mentioned.

"However, we are now faced with a situation that will destroy even the potentialities of our great harvest of this year. It will be wanted at high prices. The productive capacity of European countries, except Russia, will be demoralized for some time, even though the war does not burst into full flame.

"So we must send forth our freights and our people. In 1910, at Buenos Aires, I started a movement at the Pan-American Conference to make the Western Hemisphere independent. It is to be hoped that the lesson may now be brought home and that the studies of a lifetime may no longer be sneered at as academic.

WESTERN HEMISPHERE TO SUFFER.

"The Western Hemisphere will suffer terribly from the withdrawal of transportation facilities from both North and South America.

"What can be done immediately, and what are the dangers?

"In the Panama Canal act we have already power to buy foreign ships and run them in the foreign trade under the United States flag. They must not be more than five years old. This was to prevent our becoming the dumping ground or junk heap for old and worn-out vessels which, if sold, would furnish money to our rivals to buy up-to-date vessels with which the old ones could not compete. We can not get enough vessels under existing conditions to do our work.

"The great tank vessels of the Standard Oil Co. could carry grain in bulk if it be not contraband, but they could take our grain to some neutral port. But these are only a handful. The new vessels of the United Fruit are splendid boats and could take care of a small part of the passenger traffic. As regards our coasting trade, the vessels there could be attracted off at a price, but the people would pay it many times over in railroad rates.

"We must not relinquish the slight hold on West Indian and Mexican trade, upon which Canada, with common-sense banking and commercial laws, is making such inroads.

"So we are face to face with the problem of attracting foreign vessels that war conditions limit in profit making to purchase by Americans, for they must be owned outright.

POWER FOR THE PRESIDENT.

"The Congress should empower the President, when a condition exists which interferes with free navigation of the oceans to such an extent as to militate against the country's interests, to permit the registry of foreign vessels owned entirely by American citizens or State corporations. This would require only that the limit regarding age should be omitted at the President's discretion. Of course when the alarm of war was ended he would permit no more such entries.

"No age limit should be stated in such amendment at all, as there are vessels 20 years and older that with the use of modern appliances in machinery could render us needful service under existing conditions."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Washirgton.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what provision the bill makes with reference to the establishment of these lines; that is, the sailing points of ships.

Mr. WEEKS. Replying to the Senator from Washington, the bill does not provide anything definite about the sailing points of the ships or how many lines shall be established; it leaves it optional with the Secretary of the Navy to use such vessels as are available for the purpose to establish and maintain lines as from the west coast of the United States to the east coast of South America, through the canal, or from the east coast of the United States to the west coast of South America, through the canal.

Mr. JONES. Does it confine the Secretary to establishing lines from points on the west coast to the east coast of South America? Would it prevent him from establishing a line from points on the west coast of the United States to points on the west coast of South America also?

Mr. WEEKS. I will read the wording of the bill, and the Senator can judge for himself. In regard to the discretion which I have spoken of the bill says:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines, by employing such vessels of the Navy as in his discretion are available, without impairment to the paramount duties of the Navy, and as are necessary and appropriate, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining regular communication between the east or west coast, or both coasts, of the United States and either or both coasts of South America.

Mr. JONES. Does the bill make any provision with reference to taking care of any trade that may be established if these boats should have to be taken off the trip lines?

Mr. WEEKS. It can not make provision for that, because under such conditions the Government would have no means of carrying on the trade. It must be remembered that these are naval vessels, that their primary purpose is use in time of war, and that this plan proposes to make some commercial use of them in time of peace. If war should break out, then necessarily they must be withdrawn from the service which they are in.

Mr. JONES. So it is simply a makeshift.

Mr. WEEKS. It is a makeshift.

Mr. JONES. But as a makeshift, if it works out some good, of course we will be glad to have it; it will be better than nothing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will not make any objection to the immediate consideration of this bill, but in view of the conditions which are now prevalent in Europe and which, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] well says, are probably going to become worse and interfere with, if not destroy, trade relations between Europe and other countries, I venture to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts the propriety of removing a restriction in the bill. In the bill as it is drawn, communication may be had between ports of the United States and those of other countries. I think it is a step in the right direction, and while it may be a makeshift, I feel very sure that the experiment is going to be so satisfactory that it will lead sooner or later to the establishment of lines operated by the Government itself, a policy which I have always favored and which I hope to live to see inaugurated.

Mr. WEEKS. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that there is under consideration in the other House, or in a committee of the other House, legislation more comprehensive than that which we are now considering, I think we may safely, if we do it at all, pass the bill in its present form, with the expectation that it will be extended or changed to conform to the conditions which have arisen since the bill was introduced.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well, Mr. President; I will defer to the Senator's superior judgment concerning the subject, but I hope the bill will be immediately considered and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator was through. I wanted to say something upon the bill itself. I did not want to ask a question.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts another question. I note that the bill provides that the passengers, mail, and freight shall be carried "under such regulations and at such rate or rates as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe," leaving the matter of rates entirely to be fixed by the Secretary regardless of the question whether they are reasonable or not. Was there any consideration given to the question in committee as to whether rates which are reasonable should be provided?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not a member of the Naval Committee, and I can not tell whether that subject was discussed or not; but necessarily we can not fix rates unless we know what ships are going to be used, how they are going to be used, from what ports they are going to start and to what ports they are going to run; and unless Congress fixes the rates in the law, we must leave the authority to some one to make the rates.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think we ought to leave to the Secretary of the Navy the fixing of the rates without prescribing some rule by which he shall be governed?

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, of course this being our own property there would be no tribunal to pass upon the reasonableness of the rates charged, and it was thought to be just as well to leave it to the Secretary without any limitation, because there could be no limitation that would not be left to the discretion of the Secretary. There being no power above that to review his judgment, it was thought best to put it in that form. That is the reason why it was put in that shape. That applies only to freight, of course.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator from Mississippi wishes to discuss the bill, I will yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has unanimous consent yet been given for the present consideration of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent has not yet been given.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to make a few remarks and to suggest an amendment or two to the Senator from Massachusetts.

It is a time-worn phrase that emergencies give rise to bad law. We are facing now a great emergency; there is no doubt about that. Our wheat is accumulating and the countries of Europe are wanting it, and it can be sent to them only at immense risk and at immense expense. Insurance rates are almost prohibitive.

I would have no objection to the passage of this bill if it went through as a temporary measure; if it recited that it was to be in force during the pendency of the present European war. To make permanently of our sailors a set of stevedores and handlers of freight when they are enlisted for other purposes, or to enlist men in the Navy with the rank of sailors whose business shall be to handle freight, and to make that a permanent policy of the United States, seems to me to be very objectionable.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me the suggestion, sailors on seagoing ships never handle freight in this day. Freight is handled by stevedores, who are shore men, at both ends of the line. Sailors run the ship and have nothing whatever to do with handling the freight at either end of the voyage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I believe the Senator is right about that; in fact, he must be, because he knows precisely about it, and I think that I, too, knew that, but had temporarily overlooked it. You are proposing, however, to take sailors of the United States in the uniform of the United States and put them to work on a freight vessel. If the Senator from Massachusetts is willing, I suggest that on line 5, page 1, right after the last syllable of the word "employing," which occurs at the beginning of that line, to insert the words "during the pendency of the present European war," until Congress can make permanent provision in a more satisfactory way than this.

Then, I would suggest to the Senator another amendment, to strike out the period on line 10, page 1, and to add the words "and between the United States and the countries of Europe." The bill at present would enable the naval ships that are temporarily to be engaged in carrying mails and passengers and freight to maintain "regular communication between the east or west coast, or both coasts, of the United States, and either or both coasts of South America." The crying need right now is to get our foodstuffs to Europe in neutral ships.

I myself think a much more satisfactory way of dealing with this crisis would have been to have passed a joint resolution putting into the hands of the United States Government a given sum of money to buy ships of belligerent powers that will be laid up in our ports and be for sale cheap, and during the war, at any rate, granting authority to the Government to lease them to people who would operate them, or otherwise, to satisfy the present emergency; but I do not want to stand in the way of anything that anybody thinks will help out. It seems to me if the Senator will add, at the point I have indicated, the words "and between the United States and the countries of Europe," he will broaden the scope of his bill and will meet the immediate exigencies much more fully. Then, if he accepts the previous amendment, he will make the bill temporary in its character; it will appear simply as an emergency bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not know that the Senator from Mississippi heard the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], that in the other House there is now in contemplation legislation much broader in its scope than this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the very reason I want this to be temporary.

Mr. WEEKS. The reason why this bill was originally suggested to my mind was that we are about to open the Panama Canal. No attempt has been made by American citizens or American capital to provide a line of steamers which can make use of the canal. It seems to me a shameful condition for us to be in, not to have a line of steamers or lines of steamers from the United States to the east and the west coasts of South America ready for service when the canal is ready for business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I heard the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts upon a previous occasion when this matter was up, and, frankly, he and I do not agree about that. I do not agree with any idea of making a part of the United States Navy freight handlers or passenger or mail carriers as a permanent policy of the United States Government.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not wish the Senator from Mississippi to understand that I approve of that as a general policy either; I do not; but I am trying to take advantage of the situation with the only means we have at hand to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if he would not agree to both these amendment, the one making this legislation applicable during the pendency of the present European war, and the other amendment making it possible now to use these ships across the Atlantic to European countries as well as to the other coast of North America and the east and west coasts of South America?

Mr. WEEKS. I will agree to the second one of the amendments. The Senator will note from a reading of the bill that whether or not these lines are established or maintained is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy; if other means of transportation are furnished by private capital, these ships can be withdrawn at any time; but I think it would be inadvisable to enter upon this enterprise for the comparatively brief time which may ensue between now and the termination of the European war. I hope the Senator will not press the amendment which he has suggested making the application of the bill temporary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts accepts the second of the two amendments, then I shall not object to the immediate consideration of the bill; but when the bill is read and considered by the Senate, I will move to amend it by offering the first amendment as well as the second amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state the second amendment? I did not hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The second amendment is to insert the words "and between the United States and the countries of Europe," so that the vessels proposed to be used shall be available for trans-Atlantic service. The main thing, I think, we ought to have in view now is getting our breadstuffs across the sea at high prices when people are needing them.

Mr. WEEKS. I will call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that we have something like 225,000 tons of auxiliary craft connected with the Navy that could be used for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all the greater reason for extending the scope of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. I accept the second amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Then, I shall not object to the immediate consideration of the bill; but I repeat that when the bill is up for consideration I shall move the first amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to know what the second amendment is. I think the Senate ought to know something about this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the second amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The SECRETARY. The second amendment is, on page 1, line 10, after the words "between the east or west coasts, or both coasts, of the United States and either or both coasts of South America," to insert the words "and between the United States and the countries of Europe."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, pending the submission of the request for unanimous consent, may I be permitted to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts to make an inquiry? I desire to say that some time ago I introduced a bill in this body having for its object the construction by the Government of 100 ships, to be built by the Government and leased to private operators, for purposes similar to those certainly implied by the pending bill. I desire to ask the Senator if there is any provision in this bill that permits the President to have the discretion as to when these vessels may be impressed into the service of the Government should any necessity require, while they are being used for commercial purposes?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, that power is left in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. The vessels may be recalled at any time for their primary purpose, which is the service of the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. Such being the provision of the bill introduced by me, that was the information I sought at this time, and I am satisfied with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi? In the absence of objection, the amendment is agreed to. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "employing," in line 5, page 1, it is proposed to insert "during the pendency of the present European wars."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President and Senators, I have already stated my reasons for that amendment, and I think the reasons are conclusive. I do not think the policy of having the Navy used for the purpose of freight handling and passenger transportation and mail carrying is a policy which should recommend itself to the people of the United States as a permanent thing. A great emergency and a great crisis excuse bad legislation, if it is temporary, when it accomplishes a purpose which seems essential for the country; but I think it bad policy to put upon the statute books this sort of legislation, especially when you consider the provision on page 2, which reads:

> The enlisted strength of the Navy, as now or hereafter authorized by law, is hereby increased by the number of men required to man the vessels so employed, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist such number of men in the Navy for such terms of enlistment, not to exceed four years, as may be desirable, and to distribute the number of men so enlisted among the various ratings of the Navy.

When you consider that that clause is in the bill giving the Secretary of the Navy a power to increase the Navy to indefinite extent—while it is a power that might be given in the face of a great crisis, to give it to one of the executive departments permanently strikes me as almost as bad policy as the other feature to which I referred, to wit, the converting of a part of the Navy into freight handlers.

There is a great deal in the esprit du corps of a body of men serving in the Army and Navy. Men enlist in the Army or the Navy because they regard that as a noble and patriotic pursuit; they have not enlisted, and probably would not enlist, if they were to go upon ships that were to be freight handlers and passenger carriers. That pride which the sailor has in his business, which is his country's business and which ought to be a public business, entirely devoted to the meeting of the enemies of his country, ought not to be torn down; and this sort of policy does tear it down to a very large extent. It decreases the sailor's self-respect. I might be willing to go into the Navy and serve there or into the Army, but I would not be willing in either capacity to go and do something else that had nothing to do with the profession of arms. So I think it is but right and proper that this measure should be confined to the emergency that is now facing us.

I have no doubt of the fact that every sailor in the Navy will be glad to do this service for the country in time of war or in time of the possibility of war as affecting his own country, or in times of war between other peoples; but, speaking for myself, if I were one of the enlisted men of the Navy, that would strike me as having taken a very unfair advantage of me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that any officers or men in the Amy have felt that they were being degraded by being put to a useful purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The officers of the Army of the United States are in charge of the engineering work on our rivers and harbors.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but the enlisted men of the Army do not go down and build the levees.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will allow me to finish. They have been in charge of the engineering work on the Panama Canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have been in charge of the engineering work recently on irrigation projects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have built wireless telegraph lines to Alaska.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And cable lines to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I can see no reason why the officers and men engaged in an honorable pursuit, carrying on a very worthy enterprise for the people, should feel degraded by being used for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the illustrations which are furnished by the Senator from Nebraska "have nothing to do with the case," any more than "the flowers that bloom in the spring." An Army officer who performs engineering work is doing work in the line of his chosen profession, of which he is very proud. When an officer goes upon the Mississippi River Commissiou or the Panama Canal Commission and takes charge of great engineering undertakings, or when he goes to Alaska, for example, to lay out the line of the railroad which is to be built there and to supervise its construction, it is a part, and the very proudest part, of the profession which he has embraced. He is not only an officer, but he is an engineer, and he is doing engineering work for this country. That is a totally different thing from putting soldiers to working building levees. If you should carry it that far, the soldier would feel that he had been taken advantage of.

I do not mean that the work degrades. The man who is building a levee is just as good a citizen and doing just as useful work as a soldier wearing the uniform of the United States; but one of them wanted to volunteer to build levees and to get paid for it, while the other wanted to volunteer to wear the uniform of his country in a position where his pay does not amount to anything or is so small that it does not enter into it as a consideration at all. I hope that the amendment making the provisions of the bill temporary will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this bill was introduced long before there was any expectation of European trouble. It has been extended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi so that the ships may be used to assist in preventing any distress which may arise on account of our people being unable to get transportation from Europe. But the purpose of the bill is not temporary; the purpose of the bill is to establish, until private capital undertakes to do so, a line of steamers to South America. So I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi will not prevail.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think that it is extremely wise to pass this bill, and to pass it at once; and, in connection with passing it, we may well consider the responsibility which falls upon us even beyond this bill. I think the responsibility falls on this Congress to see that provision is made to insure the transportation of the agricultural products and the manufactured products of this country during the war, if it shall last. It is very timely to pass this measure; and I hope that that committee of the Senate which would naturally have jurisdiction of this subject and that Senators generally will consider the question of enacting legislation that will facilitate the movement of all of our wheat which must go abroad, the movement of all our cotton and tobacco that must go abroad, and the movement of the manufactured products as well. I do not think any subject can be considered by us that is of greater importance, and I believe it is our duty to see that such legislation is passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to modify my amendment, by unanimous consent, by adding to it the words "and for the period of three months thereafter," because there might be some question as to just when the European wars did close. I ask unanimous consent to modify it to that extent, so that it shall read "during the pendency of the present European wars and for the period of three months thereafter."

Mr. WEEKS. My objection would rest in the same way against the amendment as modified.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not aware that the Senator from Massachusetts had the floor. I thought I was entitled to the floor in my own right.

Mr. CLAPP. I addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Minnesota, for a change.

Mr. CLAPP. What I desired to say was this——

Mr. WEEKS. Have I not the floor, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded to the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Mississippi desired to take the floor and speak on the bill, and the Senator from Massachusetts said he would yield to him.

Mr. WEEKS. I supposed I took the floor again.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator can take it again.

In response to what the Senator from Georgia said, I desire to make this suggestion: Is it not possible that we are drifting away from the real purpose of this bill, and yet in connection with the real purpose of the bill we can serve the purpose of the hour that has so suddenly arisen? By amending the bill so as to use these vessels in trade with other nations we meet this sudden emergency. I do not believe we should permit that sudden emergency to draw us away from the real purpose of this bill, which is to take these vessels as they can be utilized from time to time and put them into the channels of trade. This would not at all conflict with the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia that, in addition to this, we ought at this time to take up the question of meeting more fully the European situation.

So I hope we will pass this bill with the amendment already offered by the Senator from Mississippi, which makes the bill applicable to the new condition, still maintaining the original theory and purpose of the bill, and not interfering at all with the committee taking up at this time the earnest consideration of making other necessary provision to meet the condition due to the war in Europe.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is very much that I should like to say on this bill were it not so near the close of the morning hour; but, inasmuch as I do not want to be instrumental in bringing about its defeat by delay, I shall not consume much of the time and shall not be able to say what I should like to say on this occasion.

I am delighted to hear so many Senators express themselves in favor of the principle involved in this bill. I remember that for several years I have been trying to get, as an amendment on various bills, something similar to this—to have the ships leased to the Panama Railroad Co., a corporation already engaged in commerce, and use them for the identical purposes that are provided for here. I have always met with such terrible opposition, however, from many of the men who now seem to be favorable to this idea that it affords me a great deal of pleasure to recognize the conversion of so many legislators to the idea that we ought to take advantage of the opening of the Panama Canal by providing Government ships for the purpose of engaging in commerce between the ports of North and South America.

On the 24th day of January I offered an amendment to the then pending Alaska railroad bill providing for the building of 10 ships, I think, that should be leased to the Panama Railroad Co., and should be used by them in commerce between the ports of North and South America. The amendment was debated at considerable length, and had only 11 votes in its favor when it finally came to a vote. An examination of the roll call on the amendment on that day will disclose that many who seemed to be opposed to the idea then are favorable to it now.

Shortly afterwards, within a very few days after that amendment was defeated, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] introduced a resolution that was the forerunner of the bill that is now before the Senate. It was reported to the Senate a few days later by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and that resolution was passed, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information. The Secretary of the Navy seemed to be favorable to it and the result was a favorable report and this bill, which was then introduced and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and is now reported back to the Senate with a unanimity both of the committee membership and of the membership of the Senate that assures its passage within the next few moments.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WEST. That is all I wish to ask. If the 10 ships referred to were built and run in conjunction with railroads in Alaska, would not that come under the same objection as to these transcontinental railroads having vessels to run through the Panama Canal?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator must understand, and I presume the Senator does understand, that the stock of the Panama Railroad Co. is owned entirely by the United States. I think it would have been much better to have provided that these ships should be leased to the Panama Railroad Co. and operated by them. They are Government boats. The Government owns all the property of the Panama Railroad Co., but it is a regular corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York. It would have been much better to have permitted that corporation, already engaged in commerce, already the owner of ships and of a railroad, to have operated these ships in the regular business way between the ports of North and South America. It was said then, however, "Why, that is going into Government ownership; that is approaching socialism," and some said, "That is almost anarchy." We have advanced so rapidly, however, that now we come to the proposition that we will eliminate this intermediary corporation and turn the matter over to the Secretary of the Navy, who is to be supreme in the rates he shall charge, the ports he shall make, and the ships he shall use. He can do anything he pleases. He can commence where he likes and stop where he pleases.

That is better than nothing, I think. I have faith in the Secretary of the Navy. I believe he will take up this work in a good, businesslike way, and accomplish something. I think, however, it would have given the project a much better show in the business world and would have developed our commerce very much better if we had turned it over to a corporation controlled by the Government already and for a good many years engaged in commerce, and whose business it is to deal in things of this kind.

The proposition to let the Government build ships—and the Government has built the ships, or some of them, and owns all of them—and turn them over to the Panama Railroad Co. was objected to, as I have said, because it looked like Government ownership. That did not appeal to me. If it was a good thing, whether it was Government ownership or not, it seemed to me that it was proper. It seemed to me that it was the proper way to develop commerce between North and South America. The provision that I offered then as an amendment to the bill also provided for the shipping of coal from Alaska through this same modus operandi.

If, however, we want to take a step further and turn over the matter to the Secretary of the Navy, I for one am delighted that so many of these ultraconservative Senators have not only been converted to the idea, but have taken a step in advance, and have gone further than had ever been proposed before. Instead of opposing their plan, as they always did mine, I shall to the best of my ability be very glad to support them in their efforts in this connection, which I believe to be commendable.

I want to say while I am on my feet that I am opposed to the amendment, now pending, of the Senator from Mississippi. If that amendment prevails, the Secretary of the Navy will have this authority only during the present war in Europe, and for three months thereafter. It seems to me that we ought to make it permanent. If we are going to trust these matters to the Secretary of the Navy during the existence of a foreign war, there is no reason why we should not trust him in the same way in time of peace. It will be just as important, in my judgment at least, as far as the trade between North and South America is concerned, after the European war is over as it is during the existence of the European war.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am very earnestly in favor of the passage of this measure as it has been amended. It was reported from the Naval Affairs Committee, of which I am a member. I think it meets an emergency that is very urgent at this time. It will enable us to make it immediately available for the exportation of our wheat, our tobacco, and our cotton.

I am glad the Senator from Massachusetts accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, and I simply wish to express my cordial support of the measure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to dissent from the thought advanced by my friend the Senator from Mississippi. I feel that it will not hurt a naval officer to handle a bushel of wheat, or a bag of grain, or a bag of potatoes. I do not believe he will have much occasion to do it; but at least it will tend to develop muscle in the man, and from the looks of many of them God knows I think they need it. [Laughter.] I think they would be better men, I think they would be more considerate men, if sometimes they had found occasion to put on a pair of overalls.

Mr. President, I consider that a Senator is quite as good as a naval officer, but I want to say that there is one Senator in this body who has worn overalls on many occasions, handling grain, if you choose, and potatoes. I do not believe the naval officer would have much to do in that direction, for the work would be done by stevedores and sailors; but this nonsense that because a man happens to wear, through the grace of the country, a pair of epaulets he is a little too good to handle that which makes food for himself and the rest of mankind is absolutely disgusting to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to hear the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "employing," in line 5, it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "during the pendency of the present European wars, and for the period of three months thereafter."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the bill passes the title ought to be amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. After it passes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It ought to be made to read "between the United States, South America, and Europe."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States, South America, and Europe."

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WHITE:

A bill (S. 6193) granting a pension to Elmina Swan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LANE:

A bill (S. 6194) to provide for the acquisition of a site and erection of a public building thereon at Hood River, Oreg., to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 6195) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Hills (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6196) granting an increase of pension to Cynthia Buel (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6197) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia S. Hitchcock (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6198) granting a pension to Grace S. Wood (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 6199) to reinstate Elwin Carlton Taylor as a passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 6200) granting an increase of pension to John McGuire; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 6201) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make certain provisions for the care of the participants in the celebration of the semicentennial close of the War between the States and the centennial close of the last war between Great Britain and the United States, to be held at Vicksburg, Miss., on the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th days of October, 1915, and making an appropriation of a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. I introduce a bill for appropriate reference. It was my purpose to have submitted some remarks in connection with the bill, but so much of the morning hour has been occupied that I shall defer them until later.

The bill (S. 6202) to repeal an act entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of May 1, 1888, and extend the provisions of section 2391 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to certain lands in the State of Montana embraced within the provisions of said act, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 6203) to amend section 82, chapter 231, of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, fixing a term of court at Salina, Kans.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SAULSBURY:

A bill (S. 6204) for the relief of the owners of commercial motor boats; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 6205) authorizing the issuance of a patent to the city of Phoenix to certain land in the county of Maricopa, State of Arizona; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 6206) for the relief of Lloyd C. Stark; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A bill (S. 6207) for the relief of Storey County, Nev.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 6208) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin McClellan; and

A bill (S. 6209) granting an increase of pension to James M. Watkins (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SAULSBURY:

A bill (S. 6210) to encourage American commerce; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) declaring the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to establish an independent republic therein and requesting the President to endeavor to obtain the cooperation of the principal nations of the world; to the Committee on the Philippines.

KATHARINE K. ESTES.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 433), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Katharine K. Estes, widow of J. Stanley Estes, late clerk to the Committee on National Banks, a sum equal to six months' salary, at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. THOMAS. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I may add that I am directed to do so by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 434) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, authorized, by subcommittee or otherwise, to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer at a price not exceeding $1 per printed page to report such hearings as may be had in connection with the consideration of the nomination of Henry P. Keith, of Hempstead, Long Island, N. Y., to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of New York; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. What is this resolution about, Mr. President?

Mr. THOMAS. It is relative to a contest over the appointment of a collector of internal revenue for the first district of New York.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that the majority of the members of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have had this resolution under consideration, find that it is in the regular form, approve of its provisions, and ask that it may be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAR BETWEEN EUROPEAN POWERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit the following as an expression of the sense of the Senate of the United States. I ask that it may be read, and I shall be pleased to have it acted upon, if there is no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Senate of the United States, dedicating itself to the principles of peace and good will among men, deeply deprecates the war between certain European powers, and expresses the earnest hope that existing differences may be speedily adjusted, to the end that the fearful destruction of human life and the great waste of property may be averted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from New Hampshire is unanimously adopted.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD (H. DOC. NO. 1136).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and on motion of Mr. STONE, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The present disturbances in Europe, with the consequent interruption of transportation facilities, the increase in living expenses, coupled with the difficulty of obtaining money from this country, have placed a large number of American citizens, temporarily or permanently resident in Europe, in a serious situation and have made it necessary for the United States to provide relief and transportation to the United States or to places of safety.

The situation has also thrown upon our diplomatic and consular officers an enormous burden in caring for the interests of Americans in the disturbed areas and makes it necessary to provide for greatly increased expenses.

In view of the exigency of the situation as above outlined, I recommend the immediate passage by the Congress of an act appropriating $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed at the disposal of the President, for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, for personal services and for other expenses which may be incurred in connection with or growing out of the existing disturbance in Europe.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 3, 1914.

INTERNATIONAL ENGINEERING CONGRESS, 1915.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I send to the desk a joint resolution, with the request for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Engineering Congress, 1915, was read the first time by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. If that is all there is to the joint resolution, I object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is a proviso that there shall be no appropriation whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not read. I ask for the further reading of the joint resolution in full.

Mr HUGHES. I ask that it be read at length.

Mr. OVERMAN. Read the entire resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) was read the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Engineering Congress, 1915.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to invite foreign Governments to appoint delegates and otherwise participate in the International Engineering Congress, to be held at San Francisco, Cal., September 20 to 25, 1915, under the auspices of the American Society of Civil Engineers, the American Institute of Mining Engineers, the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, and the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time hereafter in connection with said congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 15613.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senate for a moment. The amendment which I introduced on Saturday provided that any person injured in his business or property by any act declared unlawful or forbidden by this act might have a right of action and recover threefold the damages. My own view of section 5 is that nothing under that section is an offense until the commission shall first designate it as an offense, and believing that, and believing that the law should also be as plain and explicit as it is possible to make it, rather than to leave the amendment on that point in any doubt I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 6. That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden by or declared to be unlawful by the commission under this act may sue therefor—

And so forth.

That puts it beyond any question that the action for damages could only be maintained after the commission has declared the act unlawful or forbidden. That is my own construction of the law, and I prefer to make it plain, so that there can be no question about it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether under the language which he now proposes the liability would not arise after the adjudication of the commission on account of acts theretofore committed?

Mr. CLAPP. I think not.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that is quite clear from the reading.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would read the amendment again. I do not know that I caught the full purport of it.

Mr. CLAPP (reading):

That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden by or declared to be unlawful by the commission under this act may sue therefor—

And so forth.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he does not think this provision will have the effect of compelling a corporation that is charged with unfair practice before the commission to fight the case to the bitter end lest it should, by yielding, practically bring into existence a large number of suits against it under the provision which the Senator proposes, and would it be good policy in framing a statute that is intended to be correctional to gradually establish an administrative law upon this subject so that the vast body of business corporations can know as the result of these decisions what they can do and what they can not do? Would it not, as a matter of public policy, be a mistake to force these corporations and individuals and firms into an attitude where they are practically compelled to fight against the charges of the commission lest a finding be made which will insure a large obligation upon their part?

I submit that consideration to the Senator from Minnesota. It seems to me that legislation of this kind might well be deferred until later on, when the commission, having acquired experience in these matters, will, under the power of recommendation, suggest legislation to Congress that will make the act more efficient.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in response to the Senator's inquiry, of course it must be conceded that in all cases the larger the sum which a defendant may be called upon to pay or the greater the penalty imposed upon a defendant in the case of conviction the more earnestly he will resist the conviction or judgment. That pertains to all litigation. If a concern has been engaged in a practice forbidden by this act, and has invested a large amount of money in the development of that practice, of course it would resist more strenuously an order of the commission which was being made against it than if it had just initiated the practice without any expense when the abandonment of it would involve only the abandonment of possible future profits. But we do not withhold penalties for a violation of law upon the theory that by penalizing an act the man committing the act is going to resist the effort to convict him. We have to meet that in all legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understand the amendment as the Senator now proposes it, it provides that the liability shall be dependent upon the declaration of the commission.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, no right of action will accrue until the commission has in some manner declared that an act is unlawful or that it is unfair competition. There is no particular method, I understand, by which the Senator would require them to so declare. Suppose they say in a letter or otherwise that this act is unlawful in that it is unfair competition, and that the person against whom that declaration is made goes into the court, as I believe he absolutely will have a right to do. I do not believe we can deprive the citizen of the right to go into the court to determine whether or not he has been guilty of an offense in some form. The court might hold differently from the commission. What, then, would become of the case of the party who has brought his action in reliance upon the declaration of the commission?

Mr. CLAPP. It would go along with the prohibition of the commission itself. This amendment of mine simply takes the law as it finds it; it simply adapts itself to the law. Whatever weakness there is in the law attaches to the amendment so far as they are related. The law itself provides that the commission upon its hearing shall, if it regards the act as coming within the definition prescribed by the bill, make an order. Whatever order it makes, whether it is a letter or otherwise, if it is an efficient order under the bill, would give the right of action. If it is not an efficient order under the bill, then, of course, it would not give a right of action.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it not a little broader than that? I think the Senator's amendment provides for the mere declaration of the commission.

Mr. CLAPP. I have put the word "order" in, so that it reads "forbidden by or declared to be unlawful by an order of the commission under this act."

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that would meet the particular suggestion that I made.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. KENYON. Will the commission declare any action unlawful? Does not the commission merely find if unfair competition has taken place, and will there not be an objection that will render recovery very difficult to a claimant under the wording the Senator employs? The commission must find it unlawful before any action can be taken.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. KENYON. I do not understand that the commission ever finds anything unlawful. If it does, we have given it judicial power. We say that unfair competition is unlawful. Now, the commission finds what is unfair competition. I fear there might be difficulty there.

Mr. CLAPP. Ipso facto what the commission says is unfair being forbidden by the act becomes unlawful.

Mr. KENYON. But the commission does not decree it to be unlawful, and under the wording of the Senator's amendment there can be no recovery until the commission decree a matter to be unlawful, as I understand it.

Mr. CLAPP. It is declared to be forbidden by or declared unlawful by order of the commission. I followed the language of the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the Senator would simply say what the commission by its order has declared to be unfair competition, that would meet the objection. Then the law itself declares that that shall be unlawful. By that wording the commission would not need to go further than their authority to determine whether or not competition is unfair.

Mr. CLAPP. Congress, if this bill passes, makes unfair competition unlawful. It either defines that or it does not. My own judgment is that it does not, and it requires the subsequent act of the commission to ascertain the fact.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. I will yield in just a moment. The moment the commission forbids an act as unfair competition that moment that act does become unlawful. Even under either view of the case it may have been unlawful before the commission made that declaration, but surely after the commission has forbidden it on that ground, it shall not then become lawful. It is to narrow down the uncertainty and make the provision more certain that I have suggested this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAPP Surely.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand the Senator's position to be that the legality or illegality of a given state of facts depends upon whether or not the commission has made an order to that effect.

Mr. CLAPP. That is my view of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if that be so, are we not clearly delegating to this commission authority to legislate?

Mr. CLAPP. That is a question it is impossible to answer "yes" or "no." Congress declares that a rate must be reasonable. Clearly Congress has made an unreasonable rate illegal, but the specific rate before it falls within the ban of that prohibition must be defined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. You may call it a delegation of legislative authority; you may call it a delegation of judicial authority. My own theory of it always was, until we passed the bill for the opening of the Panama Canal, that we prepared the law and simply left to an administrative board the ascertainment of the fact; we declared in advance that the law applied to that fact with certain force, namely, that if made the rate illegal. But in that case we went further; we practically gave the commission the power, upon the ground of the public welfare, to say how long certain limitations should exist.

Of course what is involved in the Senator's question goes to the very meat of section 5. It is not for myself or any one Senator to say, but whether that is a delegation of judicial or legislative authority and how far in such a delegation we have exceeded the right of Congress in delegating power, is a question that has to be settled later by the courts of course. I simply, as I have said before, take the bill with all its doubt and uncertainty, just as I find it, and this provision stands or falls with the bill. It is only to remove any doubt as to whether it was intended that a suit could be brought before an order was made that I have suggested this amendment, so as to place that particular subject beyond the pale of doubt and uncertainty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think in one sense the modification which is submitted by the Senator from Minnesota to his proposed amendment does narrow the effect of his amendment. As it stands as he originally introduced it the party who had been injured in his business or property by the other party could recover damages for any injury that had been committed previously to the order of the commission. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Minnesota would clearly limit the damages to be collected to such as accrued after the commission had issued its order. In that respect only is it a limitation.

The Cummins amendment, which has been adopted and now stands in section 5, says:

> That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful, and the commission after a certain hearing within a reasonable time to be stated in said order shall order the offender to cease and desist from such an unfair competition.

That is the order the commission is authorized to make, and the only one. What the Senator from Minnesota now proposes is that any person injured in business or property by any other person by reason of anything forbidden by the commission, or declared to be unlawful by the commission under this act, may sue and recover. The commission, under this act, has no authority whatever to declare anything to be unlawful. The act itself declares unfair competition to be unlawful. The commission may order the defendant to cease from unfair competition, but it has no authority to declare anything unlawful. If this act attempted to give the commission the authority to say what was lawful and what was unlawful, I think it would be clearly unconstitutional. I think it is unconstitutional now, in that it is to declare what constitutes unfair competition, instead of Congress exercising its legislative function in defining that unlawful act; but under the modification proposed by the Senator from Minnesota it contemplates that clear judicial power shall be vested in the commission.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. It no more contemplates judicial power in the commission than if we provided in the law regulating transportation that certain things should take effect, that certain rights accrue after it had made an order declaring a rate unreasonble, or now, under the law of 1906, declaring it reasonable. In that act we simply made the broad declaration, leaving it to the commission to ascertain the fact, and no consequences attached by reason of any rate until the commission made its order either declaring the rate unreasonable or declaring the rate reasonable. It is no more a delegation of judicial power than that. We simply give this right of action contingent upon the happening of an event, that event in this case being the declaration that an act is unlawful, or an order forbidding an act under the provisions of the bill itself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. While the Senator is on the floor let me ask him a question. Does he think that Congress has power to authorize one party to sue another when the President of the United States declares something to be unlawful?

Mr. CLAPP. I have no question at all but what, if in regulating some matter we had declared an act under certain conditions to be unlawful and left it for the President to ascertain the fact upon which our declaration attached, we could give a right of action upon the declaration being made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think that Congress can confer upon the executive branch of the Government the power of saying and determining what is lawful and what is unlawful?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not believe myself that there is any sanctity under the Constitution. In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for illustration, we could have decided unreasonable rates unlawful and then have referred it to any body to ascertain that fact. We could refer it to the President, to one of the Secretaries, or to a commission. We simply devolve upon somebody the ascertainment of a fact, saying in advance when you find this fact we declare the law to be so-and-so. It is just as in the case of the maximum and minimum tariff. We fixed a tariff. We can not delegate to the President of the United States the making of tariffs, but we can provide in advance that when any country acts unfairly or discriminates against us in its tariff law a maximum tariff shall go into effect, and we can provide that the evidence of that discrimination shall be the proclamation of the President. It is not delegating to the President the power to put a maximum tariff into effect. We do that under the law. We simply leave him by proclamation to declare a fact in advance, saying when that declaration is made we now declare the maximum tariff shall go into effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in order to make clearly my point again, for I think the attention of the Senator from Minnesota was diverted to some extent by another Senator talking to him when I first arose, I read now from that part of the bill which was the Cummins amendment, but which is now incorporated in the bill. It is upon page 2 of the print of the Cummins amendment. I will read it:

> If upon such hearing the commission shall find that the person, partnership, or corporation named in the complaint is practicing such unfair competition it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the offender an order requiring that within a reasonable time, to be stated in said order, that the offender shall cease and desist from such unfair competition.

That is all we have empowered this commission to do. We have declared unfair competition to be unreasonable. We have left it to the commission to determine what, from the testimony before it, may constitute unfair competition. We have ordered, or authorized, them, when they have discovered, in their opinion, a case of unfair competition, to order it to cease.

Now, the Senator says that when the commission shall declare something to be unlawful——

Mr. CLAPP. Or forbid a thing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am reading the part that I object to. I do not object to the Senator including when the commission forbids anything, because I think we have given them the power in the bill to forbid something—that is, to order them to desist from unfair competition—but the Senator proceeds to say when anything has been declared to be unlawful by the commission one party may sue another. There is nothing in the bill authorizing the commission to make any declaration as to what is lawful or unlawful. That is what I object to.

Mr. CLAPP. Under the Cummins amendment there is no question in my mind but what the commission may adopt one of two forms. It can in express terms say this act is unlawful, and we order that it be desisted from, or it might omit the words "this act is unlawful," because we having declared unfair competition unlawful, the commission may content itself with simply forbidding this particular transaction. That is why I used both the expression forbidden by or declared to be unlawful by order of the commission.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota language that I think would cover the purpose and remove the objection that has been made.

Mr. CLAPP. What other objections would I then encounter? That is something to consider with reference to the language here.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is by way of suggestion and only by way of suggestion:

Which by order of the commission shall be prohibited as in violation of this act.

Mr. CLAPP. The commission may never make an order in its whole history.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what it is authorized to do.

Mr. CLAPP. But it may never make an order reciting that the act is forbidden by this law. It may simply forbid the act. It may say the act is unlawful. It may use any form of language which amounts to a prohibition of a continuation of the act.

That is why I adhere to these very terms. They embrace either the one or the other. If the commission declares in express terms that an act is unlawful, then it comes within the purview of those acts declared to be unlawful. If, on the other hand, they simply make an order saying to the defendant, "You must desist from this act, from continuing these transactions"—and, no doubt, they could make such an order, and it would be perfectly effective—it would have the effect of a declaration by them that it did come within the purview of the first provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the commission should make an order requiring the respondent to desist, and used that identical language, would not that be really a prohibition?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then why would not the purpose of the Senator be accomplished if he said, "When the commission shall by order prohibit the unfair competition as being in violation of this act"?

Mr. CLAPP. If they used that language, it would fall within the term "forbidden by"; but they would not have to use that language. They could declare an act unlawful, and the effect of that declaration would be to make it unlawful; there is no question about that, if this bill is good under the Constitution—and, mind you, I am considering it all the time in the light of the objections that may be raised to it in relation to the Constitution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Two things we will agree upon: First, that the question whether or not a thing is unlawful is to be determined by Congress and not by the commission. Congress determines by this bill that unfair competition is unlawful; the commission does not determine that unfair competition is unlawful, but Congress determines that. The only thing that is devolved upon the commission is to ascertain a fact; that fact is whether any person or corporation has been guilty of unfair competition. Inasmuch as the only thing that the commission can base its order upon, or take any steps upon, is upon a condition precedent which it must find, that there has been unfair competition, why would not the Senator reach everything that he hopes to reach by his amendment by the simple declaration that whenever the commission has determined by its order that any practice of any person or corporation is unfair competition, the right of action then shall follow? It does not seem to me that it is necessary in order to accomplish what the Senator from Minnesota desires to accomplish to authorize the commission to make a legal declaration as to whether or not an act is unlawful, when everything that it is desired to obtain will be secured by the mere finding of fact as to whether or not a practice constitutes unfair competition. As that is the only thing that the commission can determine, and is the basis of all of its action, it seems to me that that one determination ought to be the basis of any kind of an action for damages.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that is true in the ultimate scope of the declaration; there is no doubt about that. As a concrete illustration, suppose we take the matter of local underselling. Complaint is made, and the commission finds, in its own mind, that that is a violation of the law. Clearly if the commission could prohibit that in one form of language, it could prohibit it in the other form. It could say, "This is unlawful"; or, instead of saying that, it could say, "This is unfair competition"; or, instead of saying either of those things, the commission could say, "We order you to desist from this practice." There is no question about that.

Mr. WEST. Without ever saying what the practice was?

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, they would describe the practice, of course; but they would not necessarily have to repeat the terms of the law. We have prescribed those terms ourselves. So they could use either of those three forms. That being the case, why should we waste time upon words here when this provision covers it all?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question, coming right to his own illustration of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission, when it decides a question, does not declare that a given act is contrary to law; it declares, if a rate is involved, that that rate is unreasonable; and upon that declaration it proceeds to do whatever is necessary to prevent the continuance of the thing which the law has declared to be unlawful. In this case, in every instance, the only thing, it seems to me, that the commission can determine as the basis of its action is that the act constitutes unfair competition. Then, if it has got to declare that an act is unfair competition, I do not believe that it could enter an order saying simply that this act is unlawful; it would have to comply with the statute; it would be compelled simply to find what the law instructs and delegates it to find—whether a certain act constitutes unfair competition, not whether it is unlawful.

Mr. CLAPP. Suppose it did not say, in express terms, "This is unlawful"; then this language simply has no application to such language by the commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission has developed the custom of saying that a given rate, for instance, is unreasonable; but there is no question that the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the law, could say, "This rate is illegal because we find it to be unreasonable." The Interstate Commerce Commission, however, does not repeat the word "illegal," because we have put that into the law; and it follows of its own force that when they find an act unreasonable we have declared it to be illegal.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Would it disturb the Senator if I should ask him a question or two?

Mr. CLAPP. Not at all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I was very much impressed by the suggestion made by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] when this amendment was last under discussion. He said if a person who was the victim of an unfair trade practice that was subsequently condemned by the commission should bring action in advance of that finding by the commission the courts might decide that the practice of which he complained was not unfair competition, whereas subsequently the commission might decide that it was, and vice versa. It seems to me, therefore, that some notice should be taken of the existence of the commission, either by prohibiting a suit to be brought until after the commission has declared a practice to be unfair competition, and then give a cause of action to all who may have previously suffered, or to give a cause of action dating from that time in the event the offender should persist in the practice after the commission had condemned it. I think full justice would require that after the commission had declared a certain practice to be unfair competition, there should be a right of action on the part of all who have suffered from that particular form of unfair trade; but I am not committed at all to the view that in advance of some finding of that kind everybody could sue everybody else who he supposed to be engaged in unfair competition with him.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Arkansas was out of the Chamber this morning when the matter first came up?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAPP. Personally, I do not believe that any act can be construed as a violation until the commission has passed on it——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is quite right.

Mr. CLAPP. But to make that plain in the amendment I have inserted these words:

Anything forbidden by or declared unlawful by an order of the commission under this act.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all right.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senate is ready for a vote I shall call for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the amendment offered by me, with the suggestion that if that amendment should be adopted it is very doubtful whether it would add anything to the law; it is very probable at least that, without any express language, a person wronged by a declared violation of the law would be able to recover actual damages, anyway.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he does not believe that it would simplify the amendment if he would use the word "unfair" instead of the word "unlawful"?

Mr. CLAPP. No; and for this reason: If this bill passes in its present form, we shall then have declared that an unfair practice is unlawful. The commission acting under that would do one of three things in case it found for the complainant. It would either find that the practice was unlawful—and no doubt it could use that term; it could find that it was unfair and it might use that term; but in all cases it would forbid the continuance of the practice.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's position very thoroughly; but, on the other hand, in the bill we declare unfair competition unlawful.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. We give the commission power only to declare what unfair competition is, and after they have declared that a certain practice is unfair competition, that practice immediately becomes unlawful. So, it seems to me, that it would answer the same purpose which the Senator desires to have the amendment answer to use the word "unfair," and would make it very much more simple and plain.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President, one of two things is certain: Either, in a concrete illustration that I might call to mind, a given practice becomes unlawful the moment this bill passes or it does not become unlawful until the commission finds that it is an unlawful practice. In either view, when they do find that it is an unfair practice it is unlawful, assuming now that this bill is constitutional.

Mr. BRADY. That is quite true; but we give them power to define what is fair and what is unfair competition; and why not have the amendment so state? The bill so states. Let us have the amendment provide that when the commission finds that competition is unfair, then this amendment shall be effective.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment is not a grant of power; the amendment acts upon the power previously granted under the bill.

Mr. BRADY. That is exactly my position.

Mr. CLAPP. If the trade commission under the Constitution can find that an act is unfair and that act becomes unlawful, then they have declared that act unlawful.

Mr. BRADY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. If they have not that power, then we declare it unlawful, provided the bill accomplishes anything at all. I have no pride of opinion in the language which I have used here, and I never do have. What I want to do is not to load this bill, but to put at least about a one-horse motor power somewhere in this legislation; and I believe the way to do it is to give the citizen who has been injured the right of action for threefold damages; and to place it beyond any question, both for his sake and for the sake of the public generally, I have, following my view as to the construction of the law, provided in this amendment this morning that that right of action can only be invoked after the commission has made its order.

Mr. BRADY. Personally I have the highest regard for the Senator's judgment in these matters, and I quite agree with him that this amendment should be adopted, and I expect to vote for it; but, on the other hand, I am convinced that it would simplify the amendment very much and make it more satisfactory to this body to use the word "unfair" instead of the word "unlawful," for in the bill we give the commission specific power to determine what "unfair competition" is, and as soon as they have determined that, then in this very bill we say that it is unlawful.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have no earthly objection to putting it in this form:

> Forbidden by, declared unlawful, or declared to be unfair competition by an order of the commission under this act.

Mr. BRADY. I think that would make the amendment much more satisfactory and effective.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in my remarks on Friday last in regard to section 5 of this bill I stated that if the first paragraph of that section was not void because of its vagueness and uncertainty, if it was constitutional and meant anything in a legal sense, it created a multitude of new civil and criminal causes of action. I presented no authorities at that time, not having investigated the question. I now wish to call attention to some authorities upon the subject, for I think the proposition I then announced is sound and is well sustained by the authorities.

In my opinion, the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] does not enlarge the bill, but rather has a restrictive effect, except as to the measure of damages.

I will read first from a case decided by the Supreme Court of Tennessee, the opinion having been delivered some years ago, in 1895, by Judge William K. McAlister, a very distinguished jurist, then a member of that court. It is to be found reported in Ninety-fifth Tennessee Reports. It has, however, on account of its importance and the sound reasoning and logic contained in the opinion, been selected as one of the cases to be reported in the Bancroft and Whitney series of reports. It has also been selected to appear in the Lawyers' Reports Annotated.

This case arose under the child-labor law of Tennessee. The statute prohibited the employment of children under a certain age in the mines. A child under this age was injured while in such employment, and an action was brought against the mining company to recover damages. The theory of the case was that the defendant company was engaged in an unlawful act when it employed a child, an act prohibited by law, as this bill undertakes to prohibit unfair competition, and that that was negligence per se, and entitled the plaintiff to recover if a causal connection could be shown between the violation of the law and the injury sustained, which, of course, must be done in all these cases.

The counsel for plaintiff requested the court to charge as follows:

> I instruct you that the laws of the State of Tennessee prohibit the employment of any child under 12 years of age in any mine in this State, and any such employment by the defendant company would be gross negligence.

That proposition was not altogether sound law, but the response of the court contained error, for which judgment in favor of the defendant below was reversed. I read from the opinion:

> The refusal of the court to give the instruction asked and the remarks made in refusing it constitute the basis of the principal assignment of error. The question presented is one of first impression in this State, but it has been frequently adjudged in other States, and is well settled upon principle. It is laid down in Comyn's Digest "that in every case where a statute enacts or prohibits a thing for the benefit of a person, he shall have a remedy upon the same statute for the thing enacted for his advantage or for the recompense of a wrong done to him contrary to the said law." Mr. Francis Wharton, the eminent text-writer, in his work on Negligence, section 443, states the rule thus: "Where a statute requires an act to be done, or abstained from, by one person for the benefit of another, then an action lies, in the latter's favor, against the former for neglect in such act or abstinence, even though the statute gives no special remedy. Thus in an action against a public officer for neglect, whereby the plaintiff was injured, it is no defense that the defendant contracted, not with the plaintiff, but with the Government; the action being founded not on contract, but on breach of duty. Even the imposition of a penalty by the statutes does not oust the remedy by indictment, nor, a fortiori, by suit for negligence, unless the penalty be given to the party injured in satisfaction for injury."
> Says Mr. Bishop, in his work on Noncontract Law, section 132: "Whenever the common law or a statute imposes on one a duty, if of a sort affecting the public within the principle of the criminal law, a breach of it is indictable, and a civil action will lie in favor of any person who has suffered especially therefrom; or if the matter of the law involves only the interests of individuals, anyone who has received harm from another's disobedience may have his suit against him for the damages." This question was considered in Pauley v. Steam Gauge, etc., Co. (131 N. Y., 90). In that case it appeared that a statute of New York required that fire escapes should be provided on the outside of all factories three or more stories in height. The act imposed penalties for a disobedience of its provisions. The defendant failed to construct fire escapes on its building, as required by the statute. It caught fire, and plaintiff, intestate, was burned to death. The court said: "I am unable to agree with the contention of appellant that the sole remedy under the statute was the public remedy, which consisted of an enforcement of the penalties provided. The requirement of fire escapes was for the direct and special benefit of the operatives in such factories, and intended for their protection, and the rule applies that when a statute commands or prohibits a thing for the benefit of a person he shall have a remedy upon the same statute for the thing enacted for his benefit, or for a wrong done him contrary to its terms." See also Willy v. Mulledy (78 N. Y., 310; 34 Am. Rep., 536).
> As another illustration of the rule, it has been repeatedly held that the running of a railroad train within city limits at a rate of speed prohibited constitutes negligence per se, and gives a right of action to anyone suffering injuries in consequence thereof. (1 Thompson on Negligence, sec. 8, p. 506.)
> So we think the employment of this minor in violation of the provision of the statute in question was an act of negligence on the part of the defendant; and a casual connection between the employment and the injuries sustained by the boy being shown, a case of liability is made out.

Again the court, in conclusion, says:

> A proper request would have made the breach of the statute actionable negligence or negligence per se.

In looking into the matter this morning I not only found this case, which of course I remembered, but quite a number of others to the same effect from several different States, and there seems to be no doubt about the principle being well settled and well sustained by the authorities.

I am also of the opinion, Mr. President, that section 5 creates a misdemeanor, and that if this bill becomes a law and the court holds that the first paragraph of section 5 is constitutional and means something, and that the commission to be created in the legislative discretion and power clearly vested in it has the right to declare what conduct shall be in violation of it, then anyone who may have done what they may declare to be unfair competition is subject to indictment for a misdemeanor and to prosecution in the Federal court.

Now, I wish to read from the case of State against Peter Fletcher, to be found reported in Fifth New Hampshire. The facts and the statute are stated in the opinion:

But there is another clause in the statute, which provides "that it shall be unlawful for any person to exercise the business of a taverner, etc., without license." And it is declared that the selectmen of any town, on application, may license any person of good moral character to exercise the business of a taverner in such town on the receipt for the use of the town of a sum not exceeding five nor less than two dollars. And the question is whether the indictment can be sustained upon these clauses in the statute. There is no doubt that these clauses in the statute were intended by the legislature to prohibit the exercise of the business of a taverner without a license. And although no penalty is enacted by the statute for any disobedience to its provisions in this respect, yet still it is settled that such disobedience is an indictable offense. The rule is that wherever a statute prohibits a matter of public grievance to the liberty and security of the people or commands a matter of public convenience without enacting any penalty for disobeying its prohibitions or commands, an offender against such statute is punishable by way of indictment for his contempt of its enactments and may be sentenced to pay a fine for his offense.

And to sustain this holding the Supreme Court of New Hampshire cites Hawkins, P. C., and quite a number of English cases.

With the indulgence of the Senate, I shall read a little further about the same subject from Russell on Crimes under the heading of "Test of indictability" for breach of statutes:

In R. v. Hall (e), Charles, J., adopted the rule laid down in Second Hawkins, chapter 25, section 4, that "it seems to be a good general ground that wherever a statute prohibits a matter of public grievance to the liberties and security of a subject, or commands a matter of public convenience, as the repairing of the common streets of a town, an offender against such statute is punishable not only at the suit of the party aggrieved, but also by way of indictment for his contempt of the statute, unless such method of proceeding do manifestly appear to be excluded by it"; and the law as laid down in R. v. Hall has been accepted as correct.

Where an act or omission, which is not an offense at common law is made punishable by a statute, the questions arise whether the criminal remedies are limited to the particular remedy given by the terms of the statute; or, in other words, whether the remedy given by the statute is exclusive of or alternative to other remedies given by other statutes or the common law. It has been laid down that where an act or omission is not an offense at common law, but is made an offense by statute, an indictment will lie where there is a substantive prohibitory clause in such statute, though there be afterwards a particular provision and a particular remedy given. "Where a duty is created by statute which affects the public as the public, the proper mode, if the duty is not performed, is to indict or take the proceedings provided by the statute." Thus an unqualified person may be indicted for acting as an attorney contrary to the solicitors' act, 1843 (6–7 Vic., c. 73), section 2, although section 35 and section 36 enact that in case any person shall so act he shall be incapable of recovering his fees, and that such offense shall be deemed a contempt of court and punishable accordingly. And a clerk to borough justices has been held liable to indictment for being interested in the prosecution of offenders committed by borough justices, as he was not liable to the particular penalty prescribed by section 102 of the municipal corporation act, 1835 (5–6 Will. IV, c. 76). When a new offense is created by statute and a penalty is annexed to it by a separate and substantive clause, it is not necessary for the prosecutor to sue for the penalty; but he may proceed on the prior clause on the ground of its being a misdemeanor. And wherever a statute forbids the doing of a thing, the doing it willfully, although without any corrupt motive, is indictable.

And for a page more cases are cited sustaining the proposition that wherever by statute an act is commanded or prohibited which at common law was not unlawful, it immediately, without further provision in the law, creates both civil and criminal action; and, there being no penalty prescribed, in criminal actions the punishment is by fine.

Now, if this bill creates a criminal offense, the common law will apply just as it was applied in the Standard Oil case. When Congress declares an act to be unlawful, we look to the common law to see what would be the proper construction of the act and what would be the result.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee, as I understand the matter, is entirely right, so far as the common law is concerned. When an act was declared to be unlawful, even though there were attached to it no provisions for indictment or punishment, it became indictable and punishable under the common law. I think most of the States of the Union have a statute which declares that anything which is pronounced unlawful becomes a misdemeanor and punishable by either fine or imprisonment, according to the terms of the statute; but we have no such statute, as I think, of the United States. I supposed there was a general statute of that sort in the Federal law, but I have looked in vain for it, and I think the search of others has been equally unsuccessful.

Mr. SHIELDS. In an examination of the statutes this morning I found none.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have, therefore, no statute in the United States making an act declared to be unlawful punishable by either fine or imprisonment, and we have no common law, so far as crimes are concerned, in the United States. I believe, therefore, the act that is here declared to be unlawful, while it would give rise to a civil action for damages—I have no doubt about that—could not be punished as a criminal act. I reached that conclusion after a somewhat careful investigation when these bills were in course of preparation. I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he has examined and reflected upon that phase of the matter?

Mr. SHIELDS. I was proceeding, when the Senator interrupted, to give the reasons why I thought this statute created an offense against the United States. Upon the authority of the Standard Oil case and the cases there cited and others to be found in the books, we look to the common law to aid us in construing an act of Congress. We look to see what construction the common law has given statutes couched in similar words and phraseology. We will in this case look to the common law to see what "unlawful" means in the sense here used. We have just as much right and there is as much authority for looking to the common law to aid in the interpretation and construction of a statute of this kind as one creating a civil action. The Sherman law is primarily a criminal statute. When we do this we find that it is clear and plain that the declaration that a certain act is unlawful, or prohibiting it, which is the same thing, makes it a misdemeanor and punishable by fine. It seems to me, therefore, that this bill broadly makes all conduct that at any time the commission may say is unfair competition a misdemeanor and a cause of civil action sounding in damages. The district courts of the United States under section 24, subsections 1 and 2, will have jurisdiction of all such cases. It is said that acts of unfair competition are so many that they can not be numbered, as well as that it is impossible to define them. Then here, by one fell swoop, we create innumerable causes of both civil and criminal actions. We make misdemeanors and civil actions of matters that have heretofore been thought innocent and that have been practiced by many of the business men of this country. More than that, the statute is so vague and so indefinite that we give no notice to the people who are to be affected of the offenses of which they may be guilty.

If I properly comprehend the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], it is a limitation of civil actions to those cases only wherein the commission, after considering the matter, say the facts constitute unfair competition; and without considering it fully, it seems to me that would lessen the evil of this statute to that extent.

However, if we grant that the statute of itself does not create a misdemeanor, this amendment would make it quasi-criminal. The damages that a man ordinarily has a right to recover is compensation for the injury he actually sustains. That is the proper measure of damages in all actions that are purely civil in their nature. By this amendment threefold damages are given. Two-thirds of this is penal. It is to punish; and if it be adopted we certainly will have criminal offenses as well as civil actions created by the law.

Mr. President, under the substitute that was offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], only corporations were within the law. Now, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], every little trader throughout all the States of this Union is brought within it. Every farmer living along the border line of States who is in the habit of dealing in stock, and sells to his neighbors over on the other side of the line, is subject to visitation and to have his books inspected. He is required to keep all the papers upon which he has made a calculation in regard to a bunch of cattle that he has sold to his neighbor across the line, or he is guilty of a high misdemeanor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Tennessee is in error about that. The amendment which I proposed, and which has been adopted, does not enlarge the inquisitorial powers of the commission in any fashion. Those powers are still confined to corporations.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator misunderstood me. I meant it extended to individuals, while the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada referred to corporations only.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Tennessee has just said that the books and accounts of the private farmer who might live along the line of a State would be opened for investigation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; and I so understand the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under, I assume, the previous sections of the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is there anything in the bill that limits these searches and investigations to corporations?

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, certainly. The bill, so far as investigations are concerned, is limited to corporations. It has not been changed in that respect. When, however, we come to announce a rule with regard to unfair competition and declare it to be unlawful, it is applied to all persons, partnerships, and corporations, because a person or a partnership may be guilty of unfair competition just as a corporation may, and if so, that person or partnership ought to be controlled and governed by the same rule of law. With regard to inquiries made by the commission into the affairs of business, however, the bill is still limited to corporations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not so understand it; but I hope that such is a proper construction of it, for I wish to see the evil of this bill limited as much as possible. But whether the visitation, the searching of private papers, the annoyance of reports authorized by this bill extends to partnerships and individuals who do business in more than one State is immaterial. The penalties apply to them.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WEST. If an individual were charged with being guilty of an unlawful act, how could that be ascertained, unless he were investigated, unless they went into his books and his accounts?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think all the provisions of the bill apply to individuals. I will not state this positively. When this amendment was adopted upon Saturday I was necessarily absent from the Chamber, and I have not gone over it and compared it with the other provisions of the bill. The Senator from Iowa, the author of the amendment, and who has taken great interest in this bill, knows more about it than I do; but it is immaterial as to the visitation and searches. The farmers and stock traders who do business in two States are all included and are all subject to the first paragraphs of the bill, denouncing unfair competition, as construed by the advocates of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, differing from the Senator from Minnesota, whose conclusion is that under the bill as it now stands and as it has been amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa no right of civil action would accrue until after an order or finding had been made by the commission, I am equally certain that as the bill now stands an action would lie immediately by any person aggrieved in a civil action to recover simple damages for whatever injury he had sustained through the unlawful acts of a competitor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not think that I have held or announced any doctrine different from the one just stated by him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no. I was stating the position of the Senator from Minnesota, not that of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that when the act of unfair competition is declared to be unlawful anyone who is injured by the act can sue for his damages and recover them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know of no general principle of law that is better established than that when the legislative department of a State declares that a mere ethical or moral wrong shall become a legal wrong, that declaration gives a right under the law to recover damages whenever damages have been sustained by reason of the act which is made a legal wrong. It is taken without the category of mere moral wrongs and becomes a legal wrong, and as such a right of action must necessarily ensue, or else we are in the position that there are some legal wrongs without a remedy.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to correct the Senator as to my view. I quite agree with the Senator. The only question is whether or not this act, per se, does make certain things a violation of it. That is where he and I would differ.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I understand that. But there is one clear declaration standing unconditioned, namely, that unfair competition is unlawful. That being so, it makes unfair competition illegal and a legal wrong; and a remedy, according to my construction of the law, must necessarily follow in case an injury has been committed. But, Mr. President, as the bill now stands no one knows what unfair competition is. No one will ever know until that question has been determined in some manner, either by a court or by this commission. It was under that state of affairs that I thought the doing of an act which the offender could not by any possibility know was an offense under the law ought not to be followed with such heavy punishment as treble damages.

The amendment as modified by the Senator from Minnesota at least has the virtue that it does make the matter definite, that no right of civil action will accrue until the commission has crystallized the idea of unfair competition into some kind of an action which constitutes the unfair competition, so that the party suing and the offender will at that time know at least what the commission believes to be unfair competition

With that change of condition, if both the parties understand beforehand what constitutes unfair competition, at least through the advise of this commission, I am not prepared to say that treble damages would be wholly improper. Therefore, with the consent of the Senate, if the amendment is to be adopted by the Senator himself, or if he is to ask that his own amendment be modified—and I understand he has done that——

Mr. CLAPP. I have made that request.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that there is no objection to it—if it is so modified, I would then ask to withdraw my amendment striking out the word "threefold."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks leave to withdraw his amendment. The Chair hearing no objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether his amendment as finally shaped will subject a man whose practice is determined to be unlawful by the commission to damages for acts committed prior to the order of the commission?

Mr. CLAPP. Why, Mr. President, there would be no deterring force in the amendment if it applied only to acts committed after they had been practically enjoined by operation of law. My purpose in this amendment is not so much to give the right to people to recover damages as to put into the law a deterring force or a stimulus, an inspiration of obedience to the law and to the enforcement of the law.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. Just a moment. The man who violates this law must be in precisely the same position as the man who commits a willful trespass. He has to respond in threefold damages—not for what he does after the court has stopped the trespass, but for what he did while he was committing the trespass, of course.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. Do I understand that the Senator wishes, by means of the pending amendment, to permit a man to recover threefold damages for some conduct or practices which took place before the passage of this law, for instance?

Mr. CLAPP. Before the passage of the law? Why, no; of course not. I could not do that.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not so sure that the Senator could not.

Mr. CLAPP. That would violate the Constitution.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know that it would. There is a very interesting decision on that very point, and I want to make that clear, because that seems to me to be the great objection to the Senator's amendment. If certain practices are going on now and those practices should afterwards be declared unlawful or unfair competition, or, in other words, should come within the provisions of the Senator's amendment, would not his amendment then give a right of action for unfair competition to some men who were injured by those practices going on now, subsequently declared unlawful, and afterwards sued upon?

Mr. CLAPP. Why, no; because that would apply a penalty to something at a time when there was no legal prohibition.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not speaking of a criminal offense. I am speaking of a civil action.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, this is criminal in the sense that it is a violation of the law, and a penalty attaches.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator does not mean to do that, I think he ought to modify his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interject a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield, and to whom?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. These acts do not become unlawful until the passage of the law.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course not.

Mr. HUGHES. Not necessarily.

Mr. CUMMINS. They can not become unlawful under the law until it is passed.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well; but this does not make it unlawful. It seeks to give a man a right to recover damages for certain conduct; and if that conduct afterwards is declared to be unlawful, any man who has been injured by that conduct—it does not say since it was unlawful, but any man who was injured by that conduct—shall have his remedy. Now, if the Senator does not want to reach back into the past, as I did not think he did, he should say so, it seems to me.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no possibility that the act could receive a construction of that kind. So long as the suit under the act concerns conduct made unlawful by the act there could be no right of action under the act until it becomes a law.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to clear up this point. The amendment reads that—

> Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act.

The acts complained of have been performed. Here is the law and these are the practices, and they were afterwards declared unlawful by the terms of this amendment. We give simply the right to sue upon it, regardless of the statute of limitations which runs against them, regardless of when the acts were done or performed.

Mr. CLAPP. This is a prohibition making things unlawful. We pass a law to-day making a thing unlawful. No one would think of saying in that law that it should not apply to acts heretofore committed, per se under the spirit of our laws it can only make it unlawful from this time on.

Mr. HUGHES. I certainly would like to see the provision made clear. I wish to call the Senator's attention to a decision of the Supreme Court. I will give the Senator the citation and he can look it up. The United States Supreme Court has held that a change in a statute of limitations might operate to revive a cause of action otherwise barred.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly a change in the statute of limitations may revive what once existed, but there will never be a moment when these things are unlawful until the bill is passed.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator's amendment changes all that.

Mr. CLAPP. Not at all.

Mr. HUGHES. But by the Senator's amendment certain conduct, certain practices, are declared unlawful.

Mr. CLAPP. Suppose instead of this amendment some one would suggest a complete penal clause that anyone guilty under this act should be punished by a fine of $1,000, would the Senator think it was necessary to insert there that that penalty should not apply to acts done before they were declared unlawful?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels like admonishing Senators that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. I have been occupying it in the time of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been occupied simply by his courtesy. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I do not think it is in accord with the general theory of this bill. This bill is not intended to be a bill defining crimes and misdemeanors, nor is it a bill that is intended to be punitive in character. It is a bill that is educational and corrective in character, and we wish through it to establish administrative law upon the subject so that every man engaged in trade in the country can have a proper understanding of what the law allows and what the law forbids.

We have the antitrust law, which is not only a civil but a criminal statute, and which provides against monopolies and restraints of trade by civil remedy. It provides a civil remedy to be pursued by the Attorney General and also provides for criminal punishment. Any of these acts complained of covered by this section which amount to restraint of trade can be punished under the antitrust law. It seems to me it might well be left to the process of evolution, to the process through which this commission will go in the next few years to determine whether or not it should be strengthened by provisions that are punitive in character.

It is true that the provision added by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] does not constitute an offense a crime or a misdemeanor, but it is highly punitive. It gives every man who is aggrieved a cause of action for three times the damages.

Mr. President, there are many practices that are on the borderland between fair and unfair. I hope that line, in the process of evolution and of administration, will be in the future very clearly defined; but until it is clearly defined I do not think it quite fair to subject the merchants and business men of the country to the danger of an imposition of a judgment aggregating three times the actual damage sustained. If that rule is to prevail why should not we apply it generally? The man who refuses to pay his debt does a dishonest and fraudulent thing. Why should we not recover judgment in three times the amount due? Why should we not give every action of tort recovery in the actual damage three or four times the amount of the damage actually sustained?

It does seem to me that this principle can be generally applied, but experience has not shown that we ought to apply it in this particular class of cases. When it does show it then we can avail ourselves of that experience.

Mr. President, so far as competition is concerned, we know that for a long time it has been almost the accepted doctrine of business men that competition means warfare, that it is characterized by the brutality of warfare, and we propose gradually, through the enlightened processes this commission will pursue, to establish civilized warfare. Now, why can not we wait until we make some progress on that line before we bring to bear upon this question of unfair competition either the terrors of the criminal law or the terrors of the civil law by imposing upon possible offenders three times the damage actually sustained?

This is a measure that it would be better to consider when the Clayton bill is up. The purpose of this bill is simply to give this commission inquisitorial powers not over business in general but over corporations, with a view to checking restraints of trade, and with a view of doing away with unfair competition. It seems to me we ought to confine this bill to that purpose, and make it educational and corrective and not highly punitive in character.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, as the suggestion has been made by the Senator from New Jersey, and you can not make a law too plain to suit me, while I do not think this law could be construed retroactive, I am going to ask permission, in line 1, after the word "shall," to insert "hereafter," so that it will read "any person who shall hereafter be injured," and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not care to discuss it further, except in response to the Senator from Nevada to say that when we passed the Sherman antitrust law we put this same provision in it. That was aimed at combinations, conspiracies, and agreements. It has been found that a condition of subterranean practices have been put into operation, and it is now necessary to reach them.

I am in hearty accord with the spirit which actuated the Senator from Nevada in reaching that condition. Instead of waiting until the horse has been stolen and then locking the door, my impression is that the thing to do is to lock the door in advance. Instead of waiting until the practices have grown up under this commission, I believe the provision should be put into the law at this time, and that is the purpose of this amendment.

I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts

[Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] which I transfer to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who is absent. I am informed that he is in accord with me upon this amendment. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. VARDAMAN's name was called). I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been called away on official business. He is paired.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and transferring it to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY (after having noted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I thought he was in the Chamber. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is necessarily absent and that he is paired.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator. I will transfer it to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN], and to state that he is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without noticing that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is out of the Chamber. I will therefore withdraw my vote unless it is necessary to cast it to make a quorum.

Mr. CATRON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and when I voted I understood that he was in the Chamber. I understand that he has not voted. I transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Brady	Cummins	Kenyon	Norris
Bristow	Fall	Lane	Reed
Catron	Gronna	McCumber	Thompson
Clapp	James	Martine, N. J.
Crawford	Jones	Nelson

NAYS—41.

Brandegee	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Swanson
Bryan	Lewis	Saulsbury	Thomas
Burton	Lippitt	Shafroth	Thornton
Chamberlain	McLean	Sheppard	Walsh
Chilton	Myers	Shields	Weeks
Gallinger	Newlands	Simmons	West
Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	White
Hughes	Overman	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Johnson	Page	Smith, Md.

Colt	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Dillingham	Owen	Stephenson

So Mr. CLAPP's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer as an amendment, on page 14, line 1, that the word "approved" be stricken out and the word "of" be inserted. The word "approved" is an improper word in that place. It is used with reference to the so-called Wilson Act which was not approved by the President but which became a statute by operation of law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14 in the committee amendment, line 1, strike out "approved" and insert "of."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 6 by adding at the end thereof the following:

That whenever in any suit brought by or on behalf of the United States under this act there shall have been rendered a final judgment or decree to the effect that a defendant has been guilty of unfair competition or used unfair methods of competition, said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute against such defendant evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of this act.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, that is so drawn that it can not interfere with the antitrust act, so called. I understand that is the reason why language has been placed in this bill making the orders and decrees ineffectual so far as the enforcement of the antitrust act is concerned. But it seems to me that if this law is to amount to anything at all, after an issue has been adjudicated between the Government and the defendant, when the time has been spent and the money has been expended and a judgment in the courts has been rendered, that judgment ought to be available to an aggrieved party so far as it is conclusive upon that particular issue and the facts established by it. It seems to me when we refuse to go that far we are simply admitting in advance that we are firing blank cartridges and receive no results.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment presented by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary again read Mr. CRAWFORD's amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have an opportunity of looking over it carefully and conferring with my associates on the committee. It is my present impression that I will be opposed to it, but I am not sure of its significance.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the matter goes over I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question. Do I understand that it is the purpose of the amendment to make the judgment—the action between the Government and the corporation—not only conclusive evidence as to the fact, but conclusive upon questions of law involved?

Mr. CRAWFORD. On questions of law also. It is practically a copy of a section of the Clayton bill as it passed the House, but confining it to actions brought under this act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think we can probably make the judgment evidence so far as questions of fact are concerned, but does the Senator from South Dakota think that upon questions of law we can preclude the courts from acting upon their independent judgment as to what the law is in another case between different parties?

Of course, the rule is well settled that where the court has determined the law in a particular controversy that determination becomes the law of the case in all subsequent proceedings in that controversy; it becomes the law of the case whether it be in fact the law or not—that is, whether it should turn out afterwards to be in conformity with the principles of law, the rule is undoubted that it becomes the law of that case. If I understand the amendment of the Senator, it undertakes to make the law of the case not only the law of that particular case, but the law of all subsequent cases which may come up involving the same state of facts, although between different persons.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will say, if the Senator will permit me, that what I had in mind when I drew the amendment was the possibility of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] being adopted. Under that amendment, suppose the Government brought an action charging the defendant with unfair competition, established the charge, and proved a given state of facts, then a citizen would have the right to bring a suit for treble damages growing out of that same state of facts, and the judgment in favor of the Government and the findings, both as to matters of law and fact, would be competent and conclusive in the suit of the citizen as evidence to establish what had been determined in the previous suit; that is, it could be offered in behalf of the complainant who had brought his suit for damages.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not observed the reading carefully, but does the Senator's amendment also include the findings and judgment of the commission?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Only the court?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just merely the decision of the court upon the law and facts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, it seems to me that there will be a distinction between the effect of the judgment upon matters of fact and its effect upon matters of law. In other words, to say that a judgment shall be evidence upon matters of fact is to lay down the rule of evidence, while to say that it shall be conclusive in a given case upon the question of law that was decided, it seems to me, would present an altogether different question. The effect of it would be an attempt to preclude the court from deciding the law in a different case.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is practically the same case, so far as the facts and so far as the law are concerned, except that the first case was between the Government and the defendant and this case is a case brought by an individual to recover upon exactly the same facts, and the judgment and findings are made competent testimony in the second suit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the point suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] presents the only objection which I think could reasonably be urged against the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. If the Senator would change his amendment in that regard, I think it would be rather a helpful addition to the bill. The Senate has just voted down—unwisely, I think, but nevertheless it has done so—the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], but still a right of action remains in behalf of any person who may be injured by an act of unfair competition.

If the Government institutes a suit against a person or corporation for unfair competition and establishes the fact of unfair competition, it seems to me entirely right that the adjudication of that matter in that respect shall be prima facie evidence in favor of any person who sues the defendant for damages for such unlawful act; I think the judgment ought to be made admissible in evidence for that purpose; but I do not think that it is within our legislative power to say that it constitutes an adjudication as between the parties so that it becomes conclusive instead of prima facie. We can not make a judgment between the United States and an individual or corporation conclusive evidence or an adjudication between other parties. In order to make the former judgment conclusive as to matters of law it would be necessary for us to hold that we had the authority to make the judgment between the United States and an offender an adjudication between the offender and some third person who must sue for damages.

I feel sure that the Senator from South Dakota, upon looking over his amendment, will see that if he desires to make it useful he must limit it to facts and not to making it a complete and conclusive adjudication.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat, I desire to ask him if this amendment can apply to the trade-commission bill at all, inasmuch as this proposed act does not authorize the United States to institute a suit and to enforce it? The suit is by the commission, and the language employed by the Senator from South Dakota has no application to the bill which is now pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; but I assume the Senator from South Dakota has used the words "United States" as the equivalent of the Federal trade commission. I think when the Federal trade commission brings a suit it is in its essence a suit by the United States, but the comment of the Senator from Texas is quite justified.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the further fact that at most a judgment of the commission is simply upon the fact as to whether there has been unfair competition. Whoever sues for damages must go further than that and not only show that there has been unfair competition, but must show how and to what extent he has been thereby damaged; so that the judgment in any view of the case can only help him upon one part of the issue, and that is upon the fact of unfair competition. He would still have to go on and prove what damages have resulted to him from that fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably that is true, and I think that the Senator from South Dakota will, upon more carefully looking over the language of his amendment, be quite willing to change it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the language of the bill as amended by the adoption of the so-called Cummins amendment is:

> If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission the person, partnership, or corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from such unfair competition, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity.

If I understand correctly the theory of the friends of the amendment, it simply authorizes the application by the commission to the court for an order to enforce the order of the commission. The court does not go into the question of whether the practices complained of before the commission did or did not constitute a violation of the act of Congress or the commission of an act of unfair competition. If the judgment of the court in acceding to or denying the issuance of an order to enforce the order of the commission is to be final and conclusive upon a third party in another suit in another court, it would seem to me to be exceedingly unfair, even if it could legally be done, because no such trial would have been had as a party in an independent suit would be entitled to. He would be entitled to present all his evidence and to have the judgment of the court upon all the legal questions in a full, free, and fair trial. Under this application by the commission the questions at issue would not have had the kind of trial which the other party in the other court would be entitled to at all.

I think, therefore, that the Senator from South Dakota, upon a more complete examination of his proposed amendment, will redraft it to comply with the theory of the act so far as it has been framed up to this point by the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Connecticut takes his seat, I should like to ask him whether he thinks that Congress has the power to determine what effect shall be given by a court to a particular state of facts; in other words, whether Congress has the power to say to the court what effect it shall give to facts in a trial that was never had before that particular court?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it is exceedingly doubtful. It strikes me offhand as though they have not. Without having had any chance even to read the amendment, which I have heard rapidly read at the desk, certainly I would not want to express a final opinion upon any provision of the amendment; but I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama is correct.

I notice another thing about it, Mr. President. As I heard the amendment read at the desk—I am not sure that I am correct in my recollection about it—it provides that the judgment of the court in a suit by the United States shall be conclusive as to the facts; but the facts which might have been presented before the commission in its proceedings or investigations to determine whether an act was or was not unfair competition, might not be at all the facts, and probably would not be the facts, presented in the other suit.

I can not, of course, express any particular definite opinion about the amendment until I have seen the redraft of it and compared it critically with the bill. The amendment ought to be printed and carefully examined, for certainly it is not a proposition to be lightly adopted.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have not investigated the question especially, but it occurs to me that the amendment devolves the exercise of judicial power on Congress, which, of course, is beyond its powers. Moreover, the amendment itself is very difficult to understand, in that it provides that the judgment or decree of the court—and I assume by that that it does not mean any decision arrived at by the commission—shall be conclusive as to the facts. To what facts does it refer? The facts in one trial may be very different from the facts in another trial. I will not say they are necessarily different, but I will say that they are almost invariably different. Consequently it would be inadvisable, if not dangerous, to conclude one case by the facts of another.

Another defect in the amendment is that a judgment or decree in favor of the defendant would not be available to it; it is only when the court finds against the defendant that the judgment or decree is to have effect. I think that is wrong. There may be cases where the facts are almost identical. They are well illustrated by an accident on a railroad in which a great number of persons may be injured or killed. The same may result by explosions in mines. In cases even of this character it would be very unfair for the legislature to say that a decision reached in any one particular case growing out of accidents of these kinds should be conclusive upon the parties or court. The amendment is unwise. I think it should not be adopted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to perfect the amendment I have offered by presenting it in redrafted form, in which I follow the language used by the Committee on the Judiciary in reporting the Clayton bill, whereby they change the language of the provision in section 6 so as to make a judgment prima facie evidence. I drew my amendment in the first place after the original clause in the Clayton antitrust bill as it passed the House, but I now change it to conform to the change made in the Clayton antitrust bill by the Committee on the Judiciary, as reported by that committee to the Senate, making the judgment of the court in proceedings under the trade commission act of the same force and effect in subsequent proceedings that may be brought by any party under the act as the Judiciary Committee propose to give to judgments rendered in cases arising under the Clayton bill in other proceedings brought to enforce the antitrust laws. I submit this new draft as a perfection of the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let it be read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask that the amendment be stated as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 6 the following:

That whenever, in any suit brought by or in behalf of the commission or of the United States under this act, there shall have been rendered a final judgment or decree to the effect that a defendant has been guilty of unfair competition or used unfair methods of competition such final judgment or decree shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding by any other party against such defendant brought under or involving the provisions of this act.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope that this amendment will not be added to this bill. This is a matter which, it seems to me, ought to be seriously considered by the Judiciary Committee, if at all. The Judiciary Committee has had under consideration legislation supplemental to the antitrust laws, and it has prepared a provision making a judgment rendered under the antitrust laws in favor of the United States and against the defendant prima facie evidence. That has been presented by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the original House provision, which made such a judgment conclusive evidence.

This whole matter has been thoroughly discussed and considered in the Judiciary Committee; it has not been discussed and considered in the Interstate Commerce Committee. It is a question that belongs more peculiarly to the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee than it does to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Committee. When the Clayton bill comes before the Senate, the Senate will find that there are four, and perhaps more, sections of that bill that are to be enforced through the Federal trade commission, and when that bill is before the Senate after this bill has been passed, in connection with the section which relates to the effect that shall be given to a judgment under the antitrust laws, the Senate can consider the effect which should be given to an order or decree made by the court upon an order issued by the commission, and the whole matter can then come up for discussion and consideration.

For this reason, Mr. President, without expressing myself at all regarding the merits or the demerits of the proposition, I move that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have had a suspicion that the provisions of section 5 will be used as a cloak to secure immunity for offenders under the Sherman antitrust laws. To make certain that that section can not be so used, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an addition to section 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator offer it as an amendment to section 5?

Mr. NELSON. I offer this as an amendment to come in at the end of section 5, as amended, by the adoption of a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 5, as the Chair understands, has been agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. But the bill is still in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment is still open to amendment, because I simply propose to perfect the entire substitute as one amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I make the point of order, Mr. President, that section 5 has been adopted and can only be reconsidered in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it can be reconsidered as in Committee of the Whole if the Senate chooses to do so, but it can only be amended in the Senate, unless it is reconsidered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the suggestion I intended to make.

Mr. NELSON. My amendment is very short and comes in at the end of section 5.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be stated. It might be stated before we consider the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 5 the following:

Provided further, That neither the orders of the commission nor the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in anywise relieve or absolve any person or any corporation from any liability under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair has not been in the chair all the while, but has been informed that this is the condition of section 5: Section 5 is a part of the substitute bill as presented from the Committee on Commerce; various amendments have been proposed and one or two, at least, adopted to section 5, and after those amendments were adopted, then the section as amended was adopted as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair believes that that precludes further amendment as in Committee of the Whole to section 5, unless the vote whereby that amendment was adopted is reconsidered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can offer the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. I should think those who have this bill in charge would be glad to have this amendment adopted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator can offer it in the Senate; but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact——

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator is in favor of the amendment, there is no need of making a point of order against it now. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment I have offered to section 5 may be now considered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. Very well; that settles it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that an amendment was offered to section 5 by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and was adopted, which, in my judgment, entirely covers the field covered by the amendment presented by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the amendment which has already been adopted to section 5, and which I offered, does precisely what is proposed by the Senator from Minnesota; but I am so anxious that there shall be no doubt whatever about it that I would be very glad to see the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota adopted, and I suggest to him that if he desires to offer it as an independent section it would be in order and would have exactly the same effect as though it were attached to section 5.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee has no objection to the principle of the amendment proposed by me, I can see no reason why he should make a technical objection, and I throw the burden on him on that account.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I want to look at the section as already adopted. My impression is that the amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa covers the entire ground, and that there is no need of duplicating terms in this bill.

The proviso added to section 5 through the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is as follows:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Mr. NELSON. That only relates to the question of evidence. It does not relate to the question of liability.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But could there be anything more sweeping than that?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will read it, he will see the difference.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The provision suggested by the Senator from Minnesota is as follows:

Provided further, That neither the orders of the commission nor the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in any wise relieve or absolve any person or corporation from any liability under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

How could any judgment or decree rendered by a court under the trade commission bill be effective in any suit brought to enforce the Sherman Antitrust Act unless it were offered in evidence and admitted as evidence? The proviso offered by the Senator from Iowa, and adopted, absolutely prevents either the order or the decree from being admissible in evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts. Can the Senator from Minnesota suggest any loophole of escape under the proviso offered by the Senator from Iowa? I assume that when the Senator from Minnesota offered his amendment, while he wished to accomplish the same purpose that the Senator from Iowa had in view, he was not aware that this proviso had been added to section 5 upon the motion of the Senator from Iowa. Reading, as I do, these two provisions as practically identical in effect, it seems to me that I ought to object to the duplication of language and the duplication of provisions in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator is confounding the matter of evidence with another matter. I was not unaware that the last provision, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, was inserted in that amendment. It simply provides, however, that the order or finding can not be used as evidence. I want to go a step further, in order that no corporation can say before the prosecuting attorneys of this country or before anybody else: "We demand immunity, because we have been brought before this trade commission, and the trade commission has found that we have not been guilty of unfair competition.

My suspicion all along has been that section 5 of this legislation will be used as a shield to protect these corporations, these great trusts and monopolies, against the enforcement of the antitrust law. I can not see any other purpose in it. Ever since the decision of the Supreme Court in the Northern Securities case there has been a clamor and a demand on the part of the business interests that we should change that legislation, that we should modify the antitrust law, that we should give them some legislation by which business may know how to be conducted without violating the law. The business interests have affected to believe that the antitrust law was so doubtful, so uncertain, and the interpretation of the courts so doubtful and uncertain, that without further legislation, without help from Congress, the business interests would not know how to conduct business.

What does section 5 propose to do? It proposes simply to take up one side, and possibly only one side, of violations of the antitrust law. In a case where the question is whether a corporation that is engaged in enterprises hostile to trade and commerce is a trust or monopoly under the law, the question as to whether it is guilty of unfair competition is only a collateral question; it is only one matter that is considered in the case.

Take the big Harvester Trust that we have in Missouri. That trust has practically swallowed all its rivals in the harvester and the mowing-machine trade and in a great many other lines of industry. It has swallowed them to such an extent that when the Supreme Court of Missouri lately found that it was a trust and monopoly it first rendered a judgment in the quo warranto case against it of an ouster; that is, to prohibit it from doing business in the State. It was afterwards found that that would not do, because the farmers of Missouri could not get any agricultural machinery except what they got from the trust. It would have been like driving the farmers of Missouri into the Desert of Sahara. Now, what can you do with that corporation? Can you make out a case of unfair competition where it simply made itself into a boa constrictor and swallowed all its rivals—absorbed them? What help can you get from this legislation?

This legislation can be used in a lot of cases where there is no trust or monopoly. It can be used by corporations or individuals to pester their rivals in business. It can be used in another way, and that is the way in which I am most fearful it will be used, because I am heartily in favor of maintaining the Sherman antitrust law, as it is called, in all its force and vigor. What I fear, and what I think will come to pass—because this is the legislation that some of the great interests want—is that they will come before the Department of Justice, they will come before the United States attorney, they will come before the public, and say: "Oh, you ought not to prosecute us. We have been before the Federal trade commission, and they have found that we were not guilty of unfair competition; so let us alone. We ought to receive immunity."

That is the argument that will be used; and it is because of that fact that I want to fortify this act so that if you go on with this side show of passing upon the question of unfair competition, if the unfair competition is by a trust or monopoly, I do not want that trust or monopoly to get any moral, legal, or other immunity under this law. It seems to me that those who agree with me as to preserving the vigor and vitality of the antitrust law ought to be willing to accept this amendment.

We have heard much said lately about the lack of definition and the uncertainty of the antitrust law, and of the interpretations of the court. Why, Mr. President, the uncertainty does not come from the law. It does not come from the decisions of the court. It comes from the great variety of the methods and schemes to which these concerns have resorted in the matter of violating the antitrust law.

Lately we had a case which seemed on its face very mild. It was the Lumber case, in which the retail lumber dealers of the country had sent out a kind of mild circular among their fellows and associates indicating to them that such a manufacturer of lumber or such a wholesaler of lumber was guilty of selling directly to the consumers without selling to the retail dealers.

They had accomplished this in a very roundabout, genteel, artificial manner. I have no doubt that under the advice of skillful counsel they had come to the conclusion that they had done it in such an evasive and such a peculiar manner that they would escape prosecution; but when the case came before the courts, especially before the court of the United States, it held that was simply a method of evading the antitrust law, and that they were guilty in substance not only of blacklisting but of boycotting.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will say that the committee is desirous of accomplishing just what the Senator from Minnesota wants to accomplish. In my judgment the language of these two provisos constitutes a duplication; but if the language of this proviso, put into the shape of an additional section, meets with the approval of the Senator from Iowa, I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. NELSON. I have offered it in that shape. If it is not satisfactory, you will have to adopt it in any shape you may desire.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very willing to see the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota adopted; but inasmuch as he has forced the issue by suggesting that the amendment which I offered to the section is not adequate and sufficient to accomplish the purpose, I must say a word upon that question.

With great deference to the opinion of the Senator from Minnesota, I reassert that the amendment to the section offered by me will be more efficient than would the amendment offered by him in accomplishing the purpose that he has in view and that I have had in view. It was prepared with considerable care; and I can not conceive how any proceeding under this section can have the effect of giving immunity in a suit brought under the antitrust law of 1890 if no order or judgment rendered in the proceeding before the trade commission, or afterwards before the court in a case growing out of a proceeding before the trade commission, is admissible in evidence in a suit brought under the antitrust law. If all judicial knowledge of what has taken place in a proceeding before the trade commission is excluded in every transaction brought under the antitrust law, it is inconceivable to me how any immunity can be brought about through such a proceeding under the trade commission.

I want—and it has been my insistence from the beginning—to leave the antitrust law untouched in all its vigor, so that every offense which it prescribes can be prosecuted hereafter just as it has been prosecuted heretofore.

I have felt impelled to say this because it might be inferred from the argument of the Senator from Minnesota that I had offered this amendment with the purpose that the enforcement of the antitrust law might be in some manner impaired by the enactment of the bill now under consideration. I am sure the Senator from Minnesota does not hold that opinion with respect to my purpose.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, is the bill before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me for a moment? We are just considering an amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, against which I made a point of order. Will it suit the convenience of the Senator from Rhode Island to proceed a little later, after we have disposed of this?

Mr. COLT. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Iowa whether he has any objection to the insertion of the following words as an additional section—section 6—taken from the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota:

Neither the orders of the commission nor the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in anywise relieve or absolve any person or corporation from any liability under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have said three times that I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota as a part of this section, although I do not understand that it is in order to offer it as a part of a section, or as a separate section. I am entirely willing that it shall be adopted. That is just what I want to accomplish.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. I asked unanimous consent to offer it as an amendment to section 5, and the Senator from Nevada objected. If he withdraws his objection, what the Senator from Nevada suggests covers the case, and I am satisfied.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not in lieu of my amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it will be in the shape of an additional proviso.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that I think the words "Provided further" should be put in to segregate it from the proposition that precedes it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, I understand the Senator from Minnesota to offer the following as an additional proviso at the end of section 5——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled on that question once. Without an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, the Chair is not going to rule again.

Mr. NELSON. I have asked unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is desirable to add this language to section 5, why not reconsider the vote by which section 5 was adopted and get it in shape so that the RECORD will show that it was properly made a part of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I make that motion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the reconsideration will say "aye."

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota offers an additional amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 5 the following proviso:

Provided further, That neither the orders of the commission nor the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in anywise relieve or absolve any person or corporation from any liability under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, a number of Senators have said that they thought it would be perfectly easy for a court to understand what the words "unfair competition" meant in this proposed bill. It then occurred to me that I would put myself in the position of a court and see how many different interpretations might fairly be given to these words.

Mr. President, "unfair competition" as used in this bill is capable of four different constructions by a court:

First. A court may take the view that the words "unfair competition" are used in a legal sense as understood in the law, and that Congress, under a well-established rule, must be presumed to have used these words in this sense. This will limit the construction of "unfair competition" to transactions based upon fraudulent practices; and if the court should be inclined to take a narrow legal view of these words they would be limited to the practice of palming off the goods of one man for those of another. I think that all actions for unfair competition which are now known to the law are based upon this fraudulent practice in one or another of its various forms.

Second. A court may take the view that Congress intended to give these words a broader meaning; that what Congress intended was that the court itself should decide whether a given transaction was fair or unfair, according to its own conscience, its own sense of right or wrong. Whether a transaction is fair or unfair thus becomes a moral question, to be solved by the conscience of each individual judge. This is a very uncertain rule, because the consciences of men differ very much as to what is fair or unfair. Unfair conduct means disingenuous or tricky conduct, and the consciences of men differ widely as to what would constitute such a disingenuous or tricky transaction as should be considered unlawful under this law.

Third. A court may take the view that these words were not used in a legal sense or in a moral sense, but that they plainly refer to such transactions as are regarded by society as unfair; that is, such transactions as are regarded as unfair according to the customs and usages of merchants or in trade generally. Under this construction the court would seek by proof to find whether a given transaction was recognized as fair or unfair in trade, and would determine a given case according to the facts presented upon this issue.

Fourth. A court may take the view that it was not the intention of Congress to use these words in a legal sense or in a moral sense or in a sense as known to trade and commerce, but that it was plainly the intention of Congress to use these words in the broad sense of comprising the various steps which lead up to monopoly; and hence that "unfair competition" within the meaning of this law signifies the various things which have been forbidden by the courts in decrees entered under the antitrust laws and all transactions of a similar nature. That such was the intention of Congress clearly appears, a court may say, from the arguments in the Senate. And in support of this construction it may be further urged that Congress was engaged in a general scheme of legislation supplementary to the Sherman law, and hence that it intended that these words should cover all those transactions which any person may employ in a scheme or plan to establish a monopoly in violation of law.

Mr. President, we are now dealing with a subject which vitally affects the commerce of 48 States and the business men of the country; and to place upon the statute books a law capable of so many different constructions would certainly lead to endless confusion, and its effect would be most injurious to the business of the whole country.

If Congress desires to enlarge the meaning of "unfair competition" as now known to the law, it should do so in express terms, so that the business community may know what is legal and what is illegal.

To pass this trade-commission bill, giving five men the power to exercise a police supervision over the business of the country and to regulate commerce by prohibiting any act which they may deem to be unfair competition in a legal sense or a moral sense or a trade sense or an antitrust sense, would be as unwise and as uncalled-for a piece of legislation as was ever enacted by an American Congress; and, further, if this is to be the character of our legislation in the future, I believe that all of us must change our ideas as to what constitutes Anglo-Saxon liberty under a democratic form of government.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, which were, on page 3, line 9, after "and," to insert "to suspend also the conditions and limitations of section 5 of said act and," and on page 3, line 12, after "to," to insert ": Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is further authorized to extend the benefits of this act to all qualified State banks and trust companies which have joined the Federal reserve system or which may contract to join within 15 days after the passage of this act."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am authorized by the Committee on Banking and Currency to recommend the approval of the House amendments with an amendment and to ask an immediate conference.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, without intending any objection, but as I do not now recall, what are the restrictions of section 5?

Mr. OWEN. Section 5 has two restrictions. One is that no bank shall receive any currency over an amount equal to its capital and surplus, and the other is that an excess of $500,000,000 shall in no contingency be allowed. The Senate committee recommends that the first limitation be adhered to in the law, but that the second one, limiting it to $500,000,000, may be exceeded if necessary.

Mr. CLAPP. I was not asking with any view of objecting.

Mr. OWEN. That is the proposed amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question? I have been receiving so many telegrams from my State that I am impelled to ask the Senator from Oklahoma to give me some information that I may communicate it. What effect, in his judgment, will this legislation now suggested have in its operation toward the restraining of the gold flow that is streaming from this country to Europe at this particular time? In what way would he suggest that it would operate to prevent such?

Mr. OWEN. In answer to that I will say that the representatives of 40 banking houses having large foreign connection and representing foreign interests were here yesterday, and they have agreed among themselves and with the Government representatives that they will do everything in their power to prevent any further shipments of gold until the war condition has abated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The danger of the capture of the gold will evidently deter shipments.

Mr. OWEN. The very high rate of insurance also deters it.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say that the fears communicated to me are the following: First, our gold going abroad, to be there placed in the war chests; the nations taking the same from the business sources, giving bonds of the country in exchange, then impounding our gold in war chests, and we to lose it altogether. Second, as the Senator from Colorado just remarked, being retarded by the fear of our people of the capture of the gold and the impressment of the gold by the captors, or its being sent to a prize court; and, thirdly, as the Senator from Oklahoma remarked, the rates of insurance increasing to the effect as though such were discount rates.

The fear which has been communicated to me is that we are not in anywise attempting to prevent this outflow of gold from our people to foreign nations. Of these conditions I have not sufficient knowledge to answer the inquiries.

Mr. OWEN. This provision now offered is made necessary until the new reserve act goes into effect. The Government can not put into force the provisions of the Federal reserve act, under which we may hereafter restrain gold shipments.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is of the opinion that with that act in effect and the appointees in performance of their duties the conditions could be met?

Mr. OWEN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LEWIS. I appreciate the Senator's information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand from the Senator from Oklahoma that the amendment offered by the Senator removes the limit of $500,000,000 upon the issue of circulating notes?

Mr. OWEN. It does. The proposed amendment is to strike out the word "and" and insert the words "in so far as the total issue of said notes is limited to $500,000,000."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think that is a very desirable amendment, and am very glad to know that it is made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. OWEN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. NELSON were appointed the conferees.

LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 23) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District, which were, on page 2, line 6, to strike out "and forty-one"; on page 3, line 15, after the word "States," to insert: "; Provided, however, That from such sum or sums as may be awarded to said owners there shall be deducted the compensation and expenses of said commission and the compensation of said jurors."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13, and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 657) to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two House thereon, and had appointed Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 312) for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

H. J. Res. 312. Joint resolution for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to report back favorably the joint resolution from the Committee on Appropriations, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, for personal services, and for other expenses which may be incurred in connection with or growing out of the existing political disturbances in Europe, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President: Provided, That American citizens to whom relief is extended or transportation is furnished hereunder shall pay to or reimburse the United States all reasonable expenses so incurred, respectively, on their account, if financially able to do so.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I would hesitate to take any time at all of the Senate if a vote was imminent, but the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] is about to proceed with a somewhat extended address, and hence I want to take just a brief time for some observations with reference to the question that troubles me concerning this bill, principally because of the observations of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and other Senators in this Chamber who are as vitally interested in preserving the integrity and the power of the Sherman Act as any other Senators here. If I felt that this bill was to be, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, a sort of a harbor of refuge for the violators of the Sherman Act, or that this bill had arisen by reason of the suggestion of eminent financiers who feared the effect of the Sherman Act and were trying to create a sort of buffer between them and the Sherman Act, I would vote against this bill.

The Sherman Act has been a sort of a legal fetish of mine for a good many years and I have made some sacrifices in trying to do my part to help bring about an enforcement of that act. I believe, Mr. President, in this bill as to its general purpose of a commission. It is suggested that we are running commission mad. Perhaps that may have some truth in it, but we have reached a point, as evidenced by this bill, which would have been a startling innovation 10 years ago, where the Government of the United States has found it necessary to attempt a regulation of what may be strictly private business. It seems to be recognized by the general progress of our times that there is no particular divinity that surrounds private business in wrongful practices; that private business can do harm to society in general and to human welfare by practices which should be for-bidden and keep private business from gathering to itself the fruit of the earth.

In an address by former Attorney General Wickersham before the Michigan State Bar Association, and I think the former Attorney General can not be accused of being a radical progressive, though I believe he is a sound one, he said:

Yet the experience of the remote as well as of the recent past demonstrates the necessity of some governmental regulation of private enterprise, in order that the fruits of industry may not be entirely garnered into a few hands, and that the freedom of individual effort may not be unduly restrained.

Of course we are entering upon a new field, a radical field, I believe a proper field, and I want to see this commission given just as much power as we can constitutionally give it.

I will go further and predict that this is the commencement of an era of still further regulation of great business. I do not believe anybody in this Chamber has anything against what is termed big business. I know I have not. It is against big, crooked business that we have been complaining. The majority of business men of this country of course are honest, but there have been a few who wanted to indulge in high finance, in crooked business, and wanted to get crooked business into crooked politics, and they have brought upon the country a desire for a stringent regulation of business practices.

I believe in a commission with even more power than this one. If this commission is to determine what is unfair competition in business, why should it not deal with unfair practices between the employer and employee in matters of business where interstate commerce is affected? And why should it not be empowered to do so? If we can constitutionally deal, as I believe we can, with competition in business and unfair methods in business, we can deal with unfair methods between the employer and the employee, and this commission I hope in the days to come will be given the power to investigate industrial conditions and the power to fix a minimum wage for the man who toils and to fix hours of service for those who engage in the great industrial labor of the Nation.

Of course, this commission has to act in a dual capacity. It has to act toward the corporation and toward the public. While we are placing enormous power in the hands of the commission, I think it is well that we have guarded one of the strategic points in this matter by the adoption of the amendment of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS]. If the amendment commonly known as the Pomerene amendment had been adopted, it would have simply led to litigation upon litigation. It would have been a good thing for the lawyers and a good thing for the stenographers. While I can not agree with my dearly beloved friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] that everybody should be permitted to kill one lawyer and not be punished for it, yet I do believe that if we can limit litigation and make it so plain that it deprives the lawyers of some of their business, the public will not be discommoded.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission's orders could have been reviewed de novo in the courts, as was contended on this floor that they should be at the time of the old railroad fight, what relief would the shipper ever have had? He would have had lawsuits galore, and he would have been lost in the maze of legal intricacy and would have given up his claim, no matter how meritorious he might have felt it to be. So we have saved this act from that very serious complication.

The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who have exhibited that large patriotic purpose not to refuse to accept an amendment because it came from this side, I believe have performed a great service to this country that they will be glad of in the years to come. You have now made this commission a real thing to the extent of its power. You have put teeth in it. I wish you had put the further teeth in it that have been suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. So as the act now stands, or will stand with the amendments that have been adopted, it will do good in this country in stopping unfair practices. If, as my good friend from Minnesota suggests, it is to injure the Sherman law; if, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has suggested, in whose judgment I have such confidence, this is in the nature of legalizing monopoly, then we are committing a very bad piece of work. I do not believe it.

I am not troubled, Mr. President, over the question of unfair competition in this act. Regardless of the suggestions of my distinguished friend from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], to whom, because of his great experience on the bench, I suppose we ought to defer, I have not been able, since listening to the argument of my colleague who collated these matters, to see any difficulty in that proposition, and I am not going to spend any time discussing it. It is no more difficult to me than the question of restraint of trade. It is no harder to define and no more difficult than has been suggested—undue influence, unsound mind, fraud, human affection. I can not define that, but I know what it means.

So it seems to me that a court will have but little difficulty in applying the term "unfair competition." I shall support the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as tending to make that a little plainer, although it seems to me it is not necessary. It is no more difficult than reasonable care, negligence. It has been used in the decrees of the courts, as has been pointed out, and decrees of courts are drawn with great care. The language "fair competition" has been used by the Supreme Court. In the discussion of the Sherman Act, when passed, it was used in the definition given at that time. I think it was used by Senator Hoar. So it is a well-established term and has a well-established meaning.

I want to add to the decrees that have been used here a little language from the decree in the case of United States of America against The Aluminum Co. There the court very carefully goes ahead in this decree and sets out some 12 or 14 different kinds of unfair competition. I will not take up all of them, and I should like to have the right to insert them in the RECORD. I shall read just a few.

The defendants were enjoined, among other things, from—

(a) Combining either by stock ownership or otherwise with any one or more manufacturers for the purpose or with the effect of controlling or restraining the output of any product manufactured from aluminum, or fixing or controlling the price thereof.

(b) Delaying shipments of material to any competitor without reasonable notice and cause, or refusing to ship or ceasing to continue shipments of crude or semifinished aluminum to a competitor on contracts or orders placed, and particularly on partially filled orders, without any reasonable cause and without giving notice of same, or purposely delaying bills of lading on material shipped to any competitor, or in any other manner making it impossible or difficult for such competitor promptly to obtain the material upon its arrival, or from furnishing known defective material.

(c) Charging higher prices for crude or semifinished aluminum from any competitor than are charged at the same time under like or similar conditions from any of the companies in which defendant is financially interested, or charging or demanding higher prices for any kind of crude or semifinished aluminum from any competitor for the purpose or which under like or similar conditions will have the effect of discriminating against such manufacturers in bidding on proposals or contracts to the advantage of said defendant or any company in which it is financially interested.

(d) Refusing to sell crude or semifinished aluminum to prospective competitors in any branch of the manufacturing aluminum goods industry on like terms and conditions of sale, under like or similar circumstances, as defendant sells such crude or semifinished aluminum to any firm or corporation engaged in similar business in which defendant is financially interested.

(e) Requiring, as a condition precedent to selling crude or semifinished aluminum to a competitor, that such competitor divulge to defendant the terms which such competitor proposes to make in order to secure the work in which the desired aluminum is to be used, and from imparting to anyone the purpose or purposes for which said competitor is intending to use said metal.

(f) Requiring or compelling the making of agreements by competitors not to engage in any line of business, nor to supply any special order in competition with defendant or with any company in which it is financially interested as a condition precedent to the procurement of aluminum metal.

(g) Representing or intimating to competitors that unless they dealt with defendant or with companies in which defendant has a financial interest for their supply of metal such competitor will not be able to obtain a sufficient supply of metal or obtain it at a price that will permit them to engage in competition with defendant or with companies in which defendant is financially interested, or in like manner representing or intimating to consumers of aluminum in any stage of manufacture that unless they deal with defendant or with a company in which it is financially interested their supply of material or manufactured products will be cut off for that reason.

(h) Taking the position with persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of any kind of aluminum goods that if they attempt to enlarge or increase any of their industries or engage in enterprises that are or will be competitive with defendant or with the business of any firm or corporation in which defendant is financially interested, such persons, firms, or corporations will for that reason be unable to procure their supply of material from defendant or any of the companies in which it is financially interested.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. That was a case brought under the Sherman Antitrust Act?

Mr. KENYON. It was.

Mr. REED. And all these acts were condemned because they were acts committed by the company in restraint of trade.

Mr. KENYON. That is true.

Mr. REED. They were not defined as unfair trade in the sense that we are now using that term, but they were various oppressive practices which had resulted in what the court held was restraint of trade.

Mr. KENYON. That is true; but I doubt if any one of these acts would have been held sufficient to have established restraint of trade. That, it seems to me, is the difference between the Sherman Act and the present act. This can take hold of matters that are not in themselves sufficient to amount to a monopoly or to amount to restraint of trade.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator that it is possible in the law to strike at those things which directly tend to restraint of trade without making it at the same time necessary to prove that an actual restraint of trade has taken place; but the various practices which are prohibited were in this case prohibited because, either taken singly or in connection with the others, they constituted a restraint of trade. It is not professed that they were defined by a court as acts of unfair competition.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; I am not pointing them out as different acts of unfair competition that enter into the question of restraint of trade.

Mr. REED. The Senator characterizes them as acts of unfair competition?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. REED. But the court characterizes them as acts in restraint of trade.

Mr. KENYON. Well, the court does not take up each one of them as an act in restraint of trade, but takes the series as tending to show a restraint of trade.

In the case that was cited the other day by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], Judge Landis goes ahead and undertakes to point out different acts of unfair competition, but the same thing will apply—that they are elements merely entering into the question of restraint of trade.

In my own State, in the case of State v. Fairmount Creamery Co. (153 Iowa, 702), the court says:

> One of the great legislative problems of the day is to protect fair competition in the business world without unduly interfering with the freedom of contract. We may properly presume that the practice is greater in some lines of business than in others. In the purchase of commodities, the methods of business adopted are quite as various as the different commodities. Methods are adopted which are peculiar and limited to dealings in a certain commodity. Evil practices, therefore, may arise in the business methods pertaining to one commodity, which do not obtain at all in relation to other commodities. Practices may obtain which contravene no statute, and which, nevertheless, would be deemed as morally dishonest and detrimental to the public interest. * * * The temporary maintenance of artificial prices for the sole purpose of destroying a weak competitor and creating a monopoly is one of the modern evil inventions.

I refer to this only to show the use of the term "fair competition."

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me a moment? Have you a statute in the State of Iowa which uses the term "unfair competition"?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; we have.

Mr. REED. Was this decision under that statute?

Mr. KENYON. I think it was.

Mr. REED. Then, of course, that presents a different question, does it not? Does not the Senator think that it is quite a different question?

Mr. KENYON. There may be some difference.

Mr. REED. If you have a statute which defines local price cutting to be "unfair competition" that covers that practice. A decision is rendered under that statute which treats of unfair competition in that limited sense. Does the Senator think that decision would afford us any definition that would be at all illuminating with reference to this bill which does not give a definition?

Mr. KENYON. I grant it would not have force and effect, of course, beyond a statement on that subject; but I refer to it to show the familiarity with which the courts use the terms "fair competition" and "unfair competition," and to establish the fact that they seem to have no trouble with the term even if the distinguished Senator from Missouri does. In the decree in the General Electric Co. case the term is also used.

Mr. STERLING. Where is it cited?

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe I can give it to the Senator at this moment, but I will hand it to him later. I was merely referring to this in passing, Mr. President, to show that, so far as I am concerned, there is no difficulty in my mind in arriving at what the term "fair competition" means any more than I have any difficulty in arriving at what a "square deal" means. I do not think the Senator from Missouri, with his cast of mind, who looks at things from every angle, and is so fair, would have any trouble in deciding what a "square deal" in business is.

Mr. REED. I have not the slightest knowledge of gambling terms.

Mr. KENYON. A very distinguished American, who has no knowledge whatever of gambling, has given us that term.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why does not the Senator substitute "an unsquare deal is hereby declared to be unlawful," and let it go at that?

Mr. KENYON. Because the entire humor of the situation is afforded by the Senator from Connecticut. If he desires to substitute those words, very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the humor is afforded by the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I am not trying to convert the Senator from Connecticut. I pass by that with a reference as to the suggestion that this statute, if enacted, will be so vague because of its terms that it will be void. In that connection there has not as yet been put into the RECORD the case of Nash v. The United States (229 U. S., 373). That is the first case in which the Sherman Act was construed by the Supreme Court as to its criminal features. It is one of the first cases where the defendants were sentenced to jail, they being very eminent millionaires engaged in the turpentine industry. The Supreme Court had absolutely no trouble with that proposition, and it certainly could not be claimed that the term "restraint of trade" is not as vague as is the term "unfair competition."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Iowa see no difference between allowing the judiciary to construe what "restraint of trade" means and allowing a commission to construe what "unfair competition" means?

Mr. KENYON. I do; but I am not discussing that feature of it. I am discussing the question of the vagueness of the statute when adopted. I think the Government had hesitated for a good many years to really press the question of the vagueness of the Sherman Act as affecting its constitutionality as a criminal statute, because many of the best lawyers in the country felt that it was too vague, but at last the statute reached the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court said this:

> The objection to the criminal operation of the statute is thought to be warranted by The Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S., 1) and United States v. American Tobacco Co. (221 U. S., 106). These cases may be taken to have established that only such contracts and combinations are within the act as, by reason of intent or the inherent nature of the contemplated acts, prejudice the public interests by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the course of trade.

That question was settled, of course, in those cases.

> But apart from the common law as to restraint of trade thus taken up by the statute, the law is full of instances where a man's fate depends on his estimating rightly—that is, as the jury subsequently estimates it—some matter of degree. If this judgment is wrong, not only may he incur a fine or a short imprisonment as here, he may incur the penalty of death. "An act causing death may be murder, manslaughter, or misadventure, according to the degree of danger attending it," by common experience in the circumstances known to the actor.
> But, without further argument, the case is very nearly disposed of by Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, No. 1 (212 U. S., 86, 109), where Mr. Justice Brewer's decision and other similar ones were cited in vain. We are of opinion that there is no constitutional difficulty in the way of enforcing the criminal part of the act.

That question was squarely presented to the Supreme Court and was settled for all time.

Mr. President, I say it in no spirit of criticism, but every time there is a great progressive measure brought forward some one always thrusts the Constitution in front of it. I have just as much respect and veneration for the Constitution as has anyone. If we are satisfied that a measure is unconstitutional, of course, we should not vote for it; but if we merely have a doubt as to whether or not it is constitutional, then, it seems to me, it is not our province to vote against it for that reason.

We have heard a good deal of just criticism as to the infringement upon legislative power by the Executive power, and there has been much said as to the necessity of keeping the three departments of the Government separate and distinct. That applies also as to encroachments of the legislative branch on the judicial. I think, however, we ought not, because of the mere suggestion that a thing may be unconstitutional, refuse to support it, but should leave that for the proper tribunal to decide.

We never would have had any employers' liability bill if we had hesitated on the question of its constitutionality; we would have had no pure-food act or pure-drug act; nor shall we have any workmen's compensation act, if we ever get that, as I hope we may, if we hesitate on constitutional doubts. The Constitution has kept pace in its march to some extent with the great forward economic thought of this country.

Now, I want to say just a word about the question that does trouble me, and I would not be troubled by it if it had not been suggested by such a good friend of the Sherman Act as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

I can not conceive how this bill will help monopoly. It is beyond my comprehension, for a moment, to understand how striking down a wrongful practice and unfair competition can in any way help monopoly, as has been suggested here on the floor.

Mr. President, in this country there is, of course, a school of political thought preaching the doctrine that competition has ceased; that it is foolish to talk about competition; that co-operation and combination are the fairest children of our advanced civilization. We can not get back to some of the old methods of competition, it is true, but, nevertheless, fair competition is the business law of this country, and the Supreme Court utters just two or three lines bearing on that thought which I will put into my remarks. In the case of The United States v. The Union Pacific Railroad Co. (226 U. S., 83) the court said:

Of the Sherman Act and kindred statutes, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice McKenna, said in National Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas:

"According to them"—

That is, these cases—

"competition, not combination, should be the law of trade. If there is evil in this, it is accepted as less than that which may result from the unification of interest and the power such unification gives. And that legislatures may so ordain this court has decided."

Of course it is a troublesome question. It has been suggested here that some eminent gentlemen, who had been prominent in the organization of trusts, after the decision of the Standard Oil and the Tobacco Trust cases had started a propaganda that has brought about this bill. It is true that Mr. Gary, after those decisions, made some suggestion with reference to a trade commission, but a trade commission had been talked of before that time; and I have not observed any wild enthusiasm on the part of Mr. Gary or on the part of Mr. Perkins for this particular measure. The trade commission they desired was quite different. I am not going to subscribe, if I know myself, to the doctrine that monopoly is in this country to stay, that we can not help it, and, consequently, that the thing to do is to regulate it. If we are going to concede, after all these years, that this Government is powerless to destroy monopoly, then we have got to concede that monopoly is powerful enough to destroy this Government; and, for my part, I believe that the Sherman Act is an effective law, if enforced, to destroy monopoly.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. KENYON. Gladly.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator has no doubt, I take it, that the words "unfair competition" are as susceptible of a practical application as are the words "restraint of trade"?

Mr. KENYON. I have no question about that, in my mind.

Mr. CLAPP. I have not, either. I may vote—I rather expect to vote—for this measure, because ofttimes we have to take the less of two evils; but if the words "unfair competition" are as practical in application as are the words "restraint of trade," then, so far as that phase of the trade commission bill is concerned, what would stand in the way of the Department of Justice enforcing a statute in addition to the existing law declaring unfair competition to be unlawful and the subject of governmental interference?

Mr. KENYON. I do not feel quite certain as to that. While the mere declaration of unfair competition as unlawful would give, I think, unquestionably a civil action, yet does the Senator think it would justify a criminal action?

Mr. CLAPP. I think we could use the same language with reference to unfair competition that we have used with reference, for instance, to restraint of trade and prohibit unfair competition.

Mr. KENYON. Making unfair competition a crime?

Mr. CLAPP. Making it a crime; just as restraint of trade is made a crime.

Mr. KENYON. I think we could.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, there are a great many things in this bill that perhaps a commission—I would rather refer them to the Secretary of Commerce—could handle better than the Department of Justice, such as investigations, the exercise of the inquisitorial powers conferred, and similar matters; but when it comes to enforcing a law, that we claim here in the Senate is a plain law and plainly defines an offense, and one which is just as easy of practical application as are the terms we have used in the Sherman antitrust law, why not deal with it as we have dealt with it in the Sherman antitrust law, and relegate it to the Department of Justice?

Mr. KENYON. Of course there are many people who believe that the Sherman antitrust law is a failure; I have heard it so argued on this floor; and the chairman of the committee who has charge of this bill suggested that he would like to see the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law put into the hands of a commission.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but I am making my inquiry now of one who I understand believes that the Sherman antitrust law has been efficient.

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, to one believing in the efficiency of the Sherman antitrust law, why does it not appeal with some force to declare an unfair practice an offense, and leave the enforcement of the statute directly to the Department of Justice, just where we have left the enforcement of our prohibition against restraint of trade?

Mr. KENYON. Of course that question is not here now.

Mr. CLAPP. But it will be.

Mr. KENYON. It may be; that will give an opportunity to reflect upon it, and I should want to reflect upon it a little before making up my mind.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President, if I am not wearisome in my inquiries——

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is very delightful.

Mr. CLAPP. We have a fixed system here; we have declared against restraint of trade; we have turned the enforcement of that prohibition over to the Department of Justice, and, in the opinion of the Senator from Iowa and in my own opinion, we agree that it has been an effective law. Now, why should we depart from the enforcement of the law at this point and take it away in its initiative from the Department of Justice and vest it in a body of men further removed from the effective responsibility than is the Department of Justice? If it is true that a law just as plain as the Sherman antitrust law, just as easy of application as a practical question in the enforcement of that law, should be turned over in the first instance to a commission, then it strikes me that by the logic of sequence the Sherman antitrust law, in the initiative of its enforcement, would be better in the hands of a commission.

Mr. KENYON. We had not reached the era of commissions at that time, or it might have been.

Mr. CLAPP. But we have now.

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to dispute the proposition of the Senator, because I might agree with him upon reflection; yet I think it is true that a law against unfair competition would be even more difficult of enforcement than an act against restraint of trade, because there would be more of the hidden things that would be difficult to get at. Now, this commission investigates, while the court would not investigate. The Attorney General's office would do the investigating.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly. If the Attorney General's office has not the force with which to investigate in this new field of legislative prohibition, we should give it the force. What I am getting at is this: To my mind, one thing or the other is always true where they are opposite things. If we have reached the point where we believe that the Sherman antitrust law has seemed inefficient in its administration, and that it would lead to the efficiency of administration in this new field to employ in the first instance a commission instead of men under the direct supervision of the Attorney General, it strikes me we should consider the same thing with reference to the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. KENYON. I am inclined to believe that if there had been a commission charged with the enforcement of the antitrust law better results might have been secured, because Congress has never equipped the Attorney General's office sufficiently to enforce the law as I think it should be enforced.

Mr. CLAPP. That brings me right to the conclusion: If that is true, then we owe it to this country to turn the whole matter of the enforcement of antitrust legislation into the hands of this commission, or else at this point sufficiently equip the Department of Justice.

Mr. KENYON. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. CLAPP. That is true; sufficient unto the day has been the evil thereof too much in legislation. We should deal with these things fundamentally. Either one policy or the other is the wise policy. We propose to go on with a policy that is condemned by the adoption of this policy, and to take up this policy and apply it only to a certain phase of the industrial situation.

As I say, I may vote for this bill; I rather expect to vote for it; but it does seem to me we are putting ourselves in a most illogical position by sustaining the necessity for this bill upon the want of efficiency of the law that already exists and make no step toward perfecting that law where it is deficient.

Mr. KENYON. I hope the Senator will prepare an amendment along the line he has in mind, and let us all discuss it.

Mr. CLAPP. I have one.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that it would be just as easy to equip the Attorney General's department fully by giving it additional help as it is to create a new commission and start it out upon unknown seas without a chart?

Mr. KENYON. Well, that may be true. I am not prepared to deny it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator that it seems to me the suggestion made by both the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] is partially met, at least, if not wholly, by the suggestion that the Attorney General is part of the political, partisan administration, and cares more for the reelection or success at the polls of the administration of which he is a part than it is supposed, at least, this commission will be. It is supposed that it will operate without regard to politics.

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe that is a good answer, with all deference to the judgment of my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. CLAPP. If it is, it is a serious arraignment.

Mr. NORRIS. It is an arraignment. I believe it is an arraignment.

Mr. KENYON. That is just what I was going to say; but even under those circumstances I would a great deal rather have the Attorney General charged with the enforcement of the law than to have a commission with a Harvester Trust director or one of the organizers of the money trust upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if the Senator will permit me, the success or failure of this commission, especially when it begins its operations, and has no precedents of actions established, will depend, in my judgment, upon the personnel that the President selects.

Mr. KENYON. Absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. He will have it in his power, in my judgment, to make a permanent tribunal of this commission or to make it a temporary one, as President Taft did in the case of the Commerce Court.

Mr. KENYON. But of course the Senator realizes that we can not stop in legislation because of what the President may do, whatever party he may belong to.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. KENYON. The same thing may be said of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Its success is dependent on the character of the men who are placed there. The same may be said of our courts. The same may be said of Congress itself. It would be an indictment of our whole form of government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion at this point which seems to be pertinent to the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KENYON. Very gladly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The commission proposed in the bill has a very important function to perform that could not possibly be performed by the Attorney General. I assume that if the office of the Attorney General were equipped with a sufficient force it could make investigations as efficiently as the commission; but after it had made the investigation it must then resort to the court and present its complaint, and no one knows better than my colleague how long and tedious is the process before there can be any conclusion that influences even the conduct of the defendant.

The commission under this bill is given certain power to make an investigation or hold a hearing and issue an order. That will be done in very much less time and in a much more summary way than it could possibly be done in the courts. It is to be hoped—and I believe that in that hope is a great part of the value of the commission—that when a commission of the kind we will have enters an order commanding a corporation or a person to cease a vicious practice in business, its order will be obeyed and the practice will cease, and we will gradually see better morals in the commerce of the country.

I beg the pardon of my colleague for making this suggestion, but I think that is one of the great merits of the commission.

Mr. KENYON. I thank my colleague for the suggestion, and I want to add to it. While the Senator from Minnesota assumes, and possibly rightfully so from what I have said, that the term "unfair competition," in my judgment, has as well-defined a meaning as "restraint of trade," I want to limit that to this extent: "Restraint of trade," of course, has a well-fixed judicial meaning, but it has taken years to work out that meaning. I want to call attention to a speech of Mr. Taft at Bath, Me., in September, 1906, before he was President, in which he said:

> It would seem as if Congress itself knew that the evil existed but had a most indefinite idea of how it was to be described.

Then, referring to the Sherman Act:

> And the matter was apparently turned over to the courts, as the cases arose and decisions were invoked, to work out the exact character of the offenses denounced and the limitations which were to be introduced into the statute in order that the interpretation of it might accord with what was practical and reasonable. * * * It was not to be expected that such a statute, dependent as it was upon judicial interpretation to make it clear, could operate effectively at once, and the slow course of judicial decision had to be awaited before the general purpose of the act could be attained.

And it did take some 15 years, through the slow process of judicial interpretation, to work out just what those words meant.

As the Senator from Rhode Island said the other day, the Sherman Act, in its literal interpretation, as demanded by that school of thought, was practically an unenforceable statute. I agree with him; but when the meaning was put in by the Supreme Court of an unreasonable restraint of trade, it became an enforceable statute; and when the Supreme Court decided the criminal features in the Nash case, it became an enforceable criminal statute.

This, however, is what I rose to say more than anything else: I would not want to see a single thing happen to the Sherman Act. The Sherman antitrust law has never had a fair chance in this country. I wonder what any law would amount to if it had been enforced no more than the Sherman antitrust law at times has been enforced. Now, it may be true that it was not an enforceable statute. It may be true that after the decision in the Knight case it was generally accepted in this country that it could not be enforced, and some Attorneys General in their opinions and in their reports so said; but if they had kept on trying to enforce it, we would have had the rule of reason established before we did have it established, and then there would have been some power in the act.

Now, Mr. President, everybody knows—it is not a matter of criticism, and I am not criticizing anybody—that the campaign of 1896 was carried by what is called "big business" in this country, which we are so solicitious about just now. Big business cared not for the Sherman Act. Big business won a great victory. It moved in; and during that administration—and I am casting no reflection on any man, living or dead—during the four years following that campaign I think I am correct when I say that there were only three small cases brought under the Sherman Act. In any event, I know I am correct when I say there were not over six cases brought.

The Sherman Act, it is claimed by many, could have been easily repealed during those years.

I feel that I am really trespassing on the time of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I did not expect to take up so much of the time of the Senate, but I want just to finish up these observations as to the Sherman Act.

It had not been enforced in the preceding administration. What would become of any law that for four years had only from three to six little cases brought under it?

If the law against sending obscene literature through the mails had no better enforcement than that, it would not amount to anything, or the law against murder, or anything else. So it is not fair to say that the Sherman antitrust law has been an absolute failure.

When it came along to the Northern Securities case, under the administration of President Roosevelt, there was some life put into the law by that decision; but, Mr. President, I stand here to say that a President who has been maligned as being controlled by special interests in this country did more to enforce the Sherman Act that any other President we have ever had. In the administration of President Taft—for I refer to him—there were 89 cases, civil and criminal, brought against the trusts and combinations in this country; more cases in that one administration than had been brought in all the preceding administrations and the present administration up to this time. Mr. President, the influences that could stop a prosecution of the Harvester Trust in a preceding administration were unable to stop that prosecution or that case in the administration of President Taft; and when the chief organizer of the Harvester Trust——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am glad to hear what the Senator says in regard to the enforcement of the antitrust law during President Taft's administration, but I wonder if he is aware that the gentleman to whose ability and industry the success of those cases was due—I am referring to Mr. Wickersham—says in the most positive manner that in order to control the trusts and monopolies of this country the Sherman law is fully capable of meeting every demand, and in the most positive way asserts that there is absolutely no necessity for the passage of the measures that are under consideration at this time in this body?

Mr. KENYON. I am familiar with the views of former Attorney General Wickersham upon that proposition. I cordially indorse what the Senator says as to his course of conduct in enforcing the Sherman Act. But the Senator interrupted me right in the center of a good sentence.

Mr. LIPPITT. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will say that the Senator has uttered so many good sentences that it will do no harm to have one spoiled.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad at this time in this public place to pay tribute to President Taft and to Attorney General Wickersham for what they tried to do in enforcing the Sherman Anti-trust Act. The organizer of the Harvester Trust, who had been able to stop that prosecution in a previous administration was not able to stop it in the administration of President Taft. So he turned aside from his former work in organizing trusts and organized a new party to assist in punishing Mr. Taft for trying to enforce the Sherman Act. While people may disagree concerning President Taft, I know, he with his back to the wall did everything within his power to enforce the Sherman Act; and if we did not have this trade commission and if the same effort were kept on to enforce the Sherman Act, we would not have many new combinations and trusts in this country.

It is all moonshine to say that the big business interests of this country do not understand what this Sherman Act means. Lawyers in the past have been employed to advise them just how to get within the law, but with the present decisions of our courts an honest lawyer can sit down with an honest client and he will not have any trouble understanding what the Sherman Act means. I believe in that act. I know it is difficult to enforce a statute of that kind. Juries hesitate because they see no moral turpitude. Courts hesitate to send trust magnates to jail and prefer to place a fine upon them. So all through the history of this great act not a single man has ever gone to jail for its violation. There have been convictions. There are men now sentenced to jail under the act. When a man is convicted immediately there is a propaganda to show what a great philanthropist he is and how he ought not to be interfered with. But if the criminal features of that act could be enforced, if the courts would give jail sentences instead of fines that are merely transferred to the back of the consumer and amount to nothing, we would not have so many trusts and combinations organized in this country.

Since the decision of the Standard Oil case there has not been much difficulty with the courts in enforcing the rule of reason. They have applied it in many cases, and the Supreme Court has decided some dozen cases since that time. I wish to put in the RECORD, and that is why I refer to this, some of these cases.

The United States v. Terminal Railroad Association (224 U. S., 383). There the rule of reason was applied to the terminal facilities of St. Louis, and it was held that a terminal association of railroads unifying all the terminal facilities of a great city was an illegal restraint unless it acted as an impartial agent of every line compelled to use its instrumentalities. There was some effectiveness, I assume, to that.

The Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. v. United States (226 U. S., 20), decided in 1912. There the parties sought to protect themselves behind a patent, having a right to lease their patent rights, but going beyond that and using that as a device to create a monopoly, and the Supreme Court held that a price-fixing trade agreement in the form of licenses under patents, controlling 85 per cent of the commerce in enameled iron ware, fixing prices, and so forth, was in violation of the Sherman Act—the rule of reason, which is nothing more than the rule of common sense.

Then The United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (226 U. S., 61). It was held by the Supreme Court that the two railroads were competing systems and that the domination of the Southern Pacific by the Union Pacific was within the prohibition of the antitrust act.

The United States v. Reading Co. and others (226 U. S., 324), where a number of coal-carrying railroads and mining companies combined to prevent the construction of an independent line into the anthracite region, by means of the instrumentality of the Temple Iron Co., a corporation whose stock was owned by defendants. It was held that this was a violation of the Sherman Act.

In the case of the United States v. Patten (226 U. S., 525), which is a famous case, it was held that a conspiracy to corner the available supply of cotton, what is commonly known as a cotton corner, and thereby to enhance its price throughout the country, was within the terms of the prohibition of the Sherman Act, because these men had gathered to themselves the control of cotton and had power to keep it out of commerce if they desired to do so.

The United States v. Winslow (227 U. S., 202), United States v. Pacific & Arctic Railway & Navigation Co. (228 U. S., 87), and Nash v. United States, the last case to which I have referred. In all the rule of reason was applied.

Mr. President, as before stated, I did not intend to take up so much time. I have no particular trouble in my mind in supporting this bill because of the term "unfair competition" or because of the vagueness of it, or because of the question as to the delegation of power, and I have not any doubt about the other question that I have suggested, and that has been suggested here, viz, that this act really helps monopoly. It is only because of the character and the ideas of the men who have suggested that on this floor that it has troubled me—the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], than whom there is no greater foe of monopoly in this country; the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], of like turn of mind—but it seems to me that there is no foundation for such a charge, and this act when it becomes a law complements the Sherman Act, that it will operate together with this law and assist in many ways in the enforcement of the Sherman Act, as my colleague has so well said here. He has had much to do with this act. No man in this country in long years of official life and public activity has shown himself a greater enemy to wrongful monopoly than has my colleague. And so I have no particular hesitancy in supporting this bill. I would not vote for the bill if I believed that it did injure the Sherman Act or lessen its power. I shall cheerfully vote for this bill, and shall cherish the hope that the power of this commission in the future will be enlarged to deal with industrial conditions, with unfairness between employer and employee. If this act shall do even a little to help in stopping monopoly in this country by getting at the unfair practices before they have fully ripened and blossomed, then it will do good and it will justify the long time that has been taken in its discussion.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have an amendment, Mr. President, that has already been proposed and sent to the desk, but which in an amended form has been accepted by the Interstate Commerce Committee. I do not understand that the Senator from Nevada as yet has offered it for incorporation in the bill. I ask the Senator from Nevada if he will not now offer it, or if I may offer it myself on behalf of the committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The committee, Mr. President, will be very glad to assent to the amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island proposes to offer.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

Mr. CLAPP. I could not hear what the Senator from Nevada said.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stated that the committee would be very glad to assent to the amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island offered.

Mr. CLAPP. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, at the end of line 3, after the word "each," insert:

> And no person who is or has been a member of the commission shall be eligible for any other office under the United States until after a period of one year from the time he ceases to be a commissioner.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to suggest to the Senator that if it is essential to put such a restriction in the bill, and personally I am very much in favor of it, it strikes me it ought to be a somewhat longer period than one year; it ought to be at least two years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that it was fully discussed in the committee, and the committee came to the conclusion that one year is long enough. They were opposed to any further time.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Rhode Island will pardon me, of course the object of this, and we may as well be plain about it, is to prevent the probable election or the campaign for election of a man serving on the commission in relation to his decision as a member of the commission. We may just as well be frank about it. If that is not the purpose it ought not to be in the law. It seems to me that one year as the period between which a vital decision may be made and the election is altogether too short.

Mr. LIPPITT. I would say to the Senator from Minnesota that as I originally drew the amendment it made the period three years. Personally, I think that three years is not too long; I think it is almost necessary to carry out the purposes of the amendment. The members of the Interstate Commerce Committee felt that period was longer than was necessary, and as I preferred to have their approval and indorsement of the amendment in the form nearest to what I could obtain, I consented to the proposal. I myself agree with what the Senator from Minnesota says. Perhaps three years is a trifle too long, I think one year is not long enough. It may be that it would be a happy compromise if the period were made two years; but the reason why it was presented in this particular form is because the committee, after a few minutes' deliberation on the subject, agreed to accept it and report it in that form. I would be very glad if the chairman of the committee thought himself authorized to make the period two years.

Mr. CLAPP. I take it the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island might be enlarged by saying in addition to a few minutes' consideration that it was the consideration of a few minutes by a few members of the committee. I do not think there has been anything like——

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say that there was a quorum of the committee present.

Mr. CLAPP. There might have been a quorum there.

Mr. LIPPITT. It has not always been the case that even on more important matters in connection with this measure we have had a quorum.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true; but personally I rather deprecate the necessity for taking a position with reference to official positions of this kind—that we have to place such a limitation. However, if we do place one, as I said a moment ago, there is no disguising the purpose of placing it. This prohibits the holding of an elective or an appointive office, and it does seem to me if we are confronted by a condition where we feel that it is necessary to say to a public official he shall not fill another office within a given period after he retires from one office, the time ought to be more than one year, especially in our view of election purposes. I will move to amend the amendment, if in order, by making the period two years.

Mr. REED. If I understand the amendment aright, it prohibits one who has been a member of this board from holding any office under the United States Government.

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. If a man has the constitutional qualifications to hold an office under the United States Government, how can you by statute prohibit him from filling any constitutional office?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say in reply to that question that that very point was considered by the lawyers on the committee, and it was their opinion that it was well within the power of Congress to make that stipulation in providing for this new commission. Of course I am myself not a lawyer, and I would have great deference for the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, but the matter, I can only say, was considered and the opinion of eminent authorities was passed upon it. I think I was informed at the time that there had been similar cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee. He will remember that in the Federal reserve act any member of the reserve board was prevented from holding an office under the Government of the United States for a certain period after his term of service.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the Senator is in error.

Mr. SMOOT. I may be mistaken, of course; but that is as I remember it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understand, with the permission of the Senator from Missouri, the provision in the banking and currency act prohibiting officials connected with the reserve banks from continued activity is confined alone to employment in national banks. That is an entirely different proposition, because, the national banks being subject entirely to congressional regulation by legislation, it was very proper for Congress to provide that they should not be employed in the national banks.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the same principle, only to a limited degree. In other words, they are prevented from holding office in national banks, and I take it for granted that in the question of qualification to serve upon the board it would not be proper immediately to enter upon some kind of business which they have been directly supervising. If you prevent them from holding any office, the principle, I think, is the same.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Rhode Island, I wish to express my very strong dissent against any piece of legislation such as he proposes and such as the chairman of the committee sanctions. It is a most serious reflection upon the citizens of the land, it is a reflection upon all congressional action of the past, that men who are to be selected for high and important public stations are so much under suspicion that they are to be debarred from holding any other office within a given time. I can not allow myself to vote for it. I think it is a vicious, unwise piece of legislation. I can not in this connection fail to express my surprise that the committee has given it its sanction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the constitutions of many of the States will be found a provision which makes a judge ineligible for any other office, some of them during the term for which the judge is appointed and elected, and others of them for a period after the term has expired. It is a common provision, I think, in our policy and is intended to relieve the incumbent of an important office that is either judicial or quasi judicial from the temptation to favor anyone in his decisions in order to improve his chances for election to some other office. I do not regard that as a disparagement of judicial officers.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he can indicate any State which has provided by its constitution that the holder of a judicial position is disqualified and prevented from being reelected or reappointed?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. On the contrary, the constitutional provisions that I have in my mind do not interfere with the eligibility of a judge for election or appointment to a judicial office, but render the judge ineligible to election to any other office.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Can the Senator cite any constitutional provision going to the length indicated by him?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do know, if the Senator will pardon me, that in several of the States there are constitutional prohibitions against a judicial officer being a candidate for any other place during the time for which he is elected or appointed to a judicial position.

Mr. CLAPP. Or within one year thereafter. I am very positive, is the provision in the constitution of my own State. That constitution also prohibits a member of the legislature for one year after the end of his term from being elected to any office created during his term of office, which involves this same principle.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator from Iowa, who, as I understand, favors this provision, why we should pursue any different course from that which has been observed in respect to the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know of any reason why this course should not have been pursued with regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I wish it were a part, and had been from the first, of the interstate-commerce law, although I am not suggesting that its omission from the law has brought any trouble or disaster upon the people. I believe that it is a wise provision. The nature and character of the powers exercised by the trade commission will be judicial; they will involve the decision of great questions between the Government and the people of the country; and I should like to see the commission barred from all sources of temptation against which we can protect them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, may I say a word to the Senator from Missouri with regard to the constitutional point? I do not understand that our Constitution prescribes the qualification for any officer of the United States. The Constitution says that no person shall be elected a Member of the House of Representatives unless he is 25 years of age and has been a citizen, and so forth. It prescribes a similar negative qualification for a Senator, but there is nothing more in our Constitution, as I remember it, than this negative qualification. I hardly think that it is beyond the power of Congress to prescribe a qualification that is not in itself repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitutional provision.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield; yes.

Mr. REED. The question was raised as to the banking and currency act; and in order to clear that up, because it has been stated that there was a similar provision in that act to the one now offered, I call attention to the language of that act as found in section 10:

> The members of said board—

That is, the Federal Reserve Board—

> The members of said board, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank.

That is a very different proposition from saying that they can not hold any office under the Government of the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a suggestion at this point, in that provision of the law just read by the Senator from Missouri we do not impose disqualifications upon the individual, but we indicate the rules and the regulations under which the national banks shall be operated.

Mr. REED. Certainly. We can reach the member bank and prescribe who its officers shall be at any time; that is all we undertake to do; but no matter how heartily one may be in sympathy with the thought expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and with the purpose of this amendment, he can not escape the effect of the Constitution, if the Constitution is in the way. I simply sk the question whether it has been considered, because, of course, if the Constitution of the United States prescribes the qualifications of a man who shall hold office then that is paramount——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will allow me to finish a sentence—that is paramount, and, of course, it can not be changed by a statute.

I have not recently examined the question; it has been a good many years since my attention was directed to it; but, so far as I have a recollection about it, it is that it has been held that where there is a constitutional qualification set forth, no statute can enlarge it or take from it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, it seems to be pretty well demonstrated that, at least in the case of the States, similar provisions are enforced, and, so far as State constitutions go, are not unconstitutional.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the reason why the State prohibitions have been sustained is found in the fact that the disqualification is not in a statute which conflicts with the State constitution, but is found in the State constitution itself. Of course, a State adopting a constitution can put whatever limitations it sees fit upon the right of any of its officers to hold office under its own constitution. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator further, but I thought it important to state this distinction.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I think I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LIPPITT. For what purpose?

Mr. KERN. To offer a motion pertaining to adjournment.

Mr. LIPPITT. Before I yield I should like to know what the nature of that motion is.

Mr. KERN. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am perfectly willing to yield for a question or for discussion of the subject which we are considering.

Mr. KERN. I announced that I desired to make a motion pertaining to the adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I will be perfectly frank. It has been intimated to me that there is a disposition to keep the Senate in session indefinitely to-day until a vote is had upon the pending bill. If that is the motion the Senator from Indiana has in mind, I prefer not to yield.

Mr. KERN. My resolution is to rescind the order heretofore made providing for a recess at 6 o'clock.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will be very glad to yield for that purpose; but I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that I have been waiting here all day for an opportunity to make some remarks on the pending bill. I understand from the Senator's statement that his only purpose in trying to obtain the floor is simply to make a motion that the session close to-day at 6 o'clock.

Mr. KERN. No; I rose for the purpose of making a motion that the order heretofore made providing for a recess at 6 o'clock each day until 11 o'clock the next day be rescinded.

Mr. LIPPITT. I did not understand that was the purpose of the Senator. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STONE. I understand that the order for taking a recess at 6 o'clock each evening until 11 o'clock the next morning was to remain as the rule of procedure until otherwise ordered.

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. STONE. On Saturday last I think it was otherwise ordered when the Senate adjourned until 11 o'clock to-day.

Mr. KERN. That is so.

Mr. STONE. As the result of that adjournment we had a morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules that the order heretofore made was set aside by the adjournment on last Saturday night.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to take an appeal from that ruling, and I wish to be heard upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling——

Mr. LIPPITT. I myself am quite sure that the Chair is in error in that ruling, but I yield to the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate? Those in favor will say "aye"——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, that question is debatable, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HUGHES. I make the point of order that a vote has been taken, just as though the roll had been called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will not enforce the point of order if the Senator from Utah desires to speak upon the question.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have the floor. I was recognized by the Chair, and I decline to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just one moment.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I did not make a point of order, and there was no ruling. There was nothing on which to make a point of order. With the permission of the Senator from Rhode Island, I rose merely to make a parliamentary inquiry, and stated what I thought would be the effect of the adjournment on Saturday last. The question would properly arise, I think, at 6 o'clock.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think the Senator might not have intended to do so, but I am quite sure that his statement as he rose was that he rose to a point of order.

Mr. STONE. No; I said I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LIPPITT. I thought the Senator rose to a point of order, or I should not have yielded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to understand the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Missouri now says that he did not make a point of order, but simply made a parliamentary inquiry. If that be true, then may I ask whether or not the Chair has ruled upon a point of order that was not raised?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair did not rule on any point of order that was not raised, or did not do so intentionally, at least. The Chair thought the point of order was as to whether the order heretofore made had been set aside by the motion to adjourn on Saturday night, and the Chair ruled accordingly. The Senator from Utah took an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and the Senator from New Jersey moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I again would like to understand the situation. If the Senator from Missouri did not raise a point of order, but simply submitted a parliamentary inquiry, then the Chair would not be warranted in ruling that a point of order which was not taken was well taken, but would simply be warranted in answering the parliamentary inquiry. If the answer of the Chair was simply an answer to a parliamentary inquiry, then I have nothing to say; but if the Senator from Missouri did raise a point of order, and that was ruled upon by the Chair, then I desire to take an appeal.

Mr. STONE. I understood the Chair to answer the parliamentary inquiry by saying that he held that the adjournment on Saturday was in effect a setting aside of the order for a recess at 6 o'clock each evening; but I did not see then, and I do not see now, just what there was immediately before the Senate concerning which a point of order could be raised to the extent of calling for a ruling from which an appeal could be taken. I think at 6 o'clock the question will arise as to whether or not the Senate shall stand in recess, and at that time the point may be raised as to whether the Chair could declare the Senate in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning under the order of last week.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Missouri be correct—and I, of course, give him credit for understanding what he did—then what the Chair did was simply to answer a parliamentary inquiry, and there is no ruling upon the subject.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Chair made a ruling.

Mr. STONE. I am perfectly willing to accept it as a ruling.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, I will submit the question, as I must submit it, to the Chair. Is it the view of the Chair that a ruling has been made from which an appeal will lie, or simply that the Chair made an answer to a parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believed at the time of the ruling that a point of order was pending before the Senate and made a ruling which the Chair thought could be appealed from to the Senate. That is what the Chair still thinks. The Senator from New Jersey has moved to lay the appeal on the table. The Chair believes that motion is in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, does the Chair take the position that a Senator upon his feet and declining to yield can be taken from the floor for the purpose of making a motion of that character? I did not yield to the Senator. I expressly declined to yield to him. A motion to lay an appeal or a motion upon the table certainly can not be made until the Senator who desires to make it has taken the floor in his own right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not going to be technical about the matter. If the Senator from Utah desires to discuss the question, he may proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, as it seems to me, the order that was made by the Senate is perfectly plain and can not admit of the construction which the Chair has put upon it. The language of it is:

Ordered, That until otherwise ordered the sessions of the Senate shall be from 11 o'clock a. m. until 6 o'clock p. m., at which last hour a recess shall be taken.

Now, on last Saturday night the Senate made no order about it. The order was not rescinded as to the rule to be observed in the future, but an exception was made.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him the date of that order?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The order was made on Monday, July 27.

Mr. LIPPITT. Is it not a fact that the Senate has adjourned since that order was made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senate did not adjourn until Saturday night, but each day, at the hour of 6 o'clock, a recess has been taken until the following morning. On Saturday, instead of the Senate observing its rule or rescinding it, it violated the rule, or created an exception to it. That does not make a new order. If, for example, on Friday night the Senate, instead of taking a recess at 6 o'clock, had in fact taken a recess at 5, that would not have been a new order. It would have been a violation of a continuing order. This order has not been rescinded. It is still in operation, and it is the rule under which the Senate is operating—that at 6 o'clock upon each day, until the Senate shall otherwise order, it shall take a recess.

Mr. President, there is no occasion for our friends upon the other side to undertake to hold the Senate in continuous session, as I understand it to be their plan to do. There is no disposition upon this side to filibuster upon this bill. There has not been a word of debate thus far that has not been entirely legitimate. The bill has been debated at some length, it is true, and as a result of the debate the committee itself has recognized that certain very important amendments should be made to the bill, and those amendments have been made. We are meeting here now at an unusual hour every morning, and we are continuing in session for an unusual time—until 6 o'clock each day. That ought to be enough. Whenever it develops that there is a manifest intention upon this side or upon the part of Senators on this side to filibuster, it will be time enough, as it seems to me, for the majority to undertake to hold the Senate in continuous session.

There are some very important questions pending about this bill. The Senator from Rhode Island has risen for the purpose of discussing it. He has been waiting here all day while the friends of this measure have been talking about it. In the main the argument of to-day has been devoted to a discussion upon the part of those who are friendly to the bill. There has been no attempt upon the part of those who are opposed to it to occupy time.

It is not quite fair, it seems to me, when the Senator from Rhode Island has just obtained the floor in this way, to insist that he shall go on for an unreasonable length of time, or that the remainder of us who may desire legitimately to discuss the bill shall not have a fair opportunity of doing so. I do not think our friends upon the other side will make headway by that sort of procedure. Of course they have the votes, I presume, and if they desire to enforce a proposition of that kind they perhaps will be able to do so, but I doubt very much whether they will make any time in the long run by it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me, we have now had this bill under consideration for six weeks. That is a very long time in such weather as we have been having. We have been hoping to bring the bill to a vote for the past week. We hoped to bring it to a vote last Saturday night, and there was a general understanding when we met to-day, at all events upon this side of the Chamber, and full notice was given to the other side, that the bill would be pressed to a vote to-day.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just at that point, I had no such understanding. I have been ready for two days here, since Friday, to address the Senate, and the time has been otherwise taken up.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no disposition to attempt to limit the Senator from Rhode Island, or to put him under any pressure. I will ask whether we can not agree to take a vote to-morrow at 6 o'clock on the bill and pending amendments?

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to say, in reply to that, that the time which the Senator from Nevada refers to has been almost entirely taken up by a discussion on the part of the lawyers in this body of the legal meaning of one clause in the bill: that is, one clause of section 5. That discussion has gone on for day after day in an endeavor on their part to elucidate the meaning of those words. I had desired to discuss an entirely different part of this bill. As a matter of fact, in all these discussions that have occurred so far the question of the propriety of creating a trade commission has scarcely been touched upon, and it was with a view of saying something briefly upon that side, and a very important side, of the legislation that is included in this bill that I wished to address the Senate.

Further than that, I have proposed an amendment here that goes to the principle upon which legislation of this kind ought to be based. I believe it touches the most vital point that there is in connection with this whole subject.

I have been for three or four years now, as a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, listening to the evidence in regard to these matters. I believe there is the greatest divergence of opinion upon the kind of legislation which ought to be passed here, but that, if there is an agreement upon any part of it, it is upon the propriety of the principle included in the amendment I wish to have passed upon being part of a measure of this sort.

The questions that are included in this bill are of the most far-reaching kind, and we can well afford to take an opportunity to thoroughly discuss at least the basic principles in connection with it.

The Senator from Nevada knows that I have not occupied any time in connection with this bill. I have scarcely said a word about it, and yet it is a subject upon which I have been spending a large part of my time since I have been a Member of this body. I do not think it is quite fair dealing to attempt at this time to shut me off.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am very sorry we have not had the benefit of the views of the Senator from Rhode Island earlier in the debate. We all know that he is a man of affairs, a man of large business experience, and I am sure we would have been glad to listen to his views.

We have been debating this matter for six weeks. The Senator says the debate has been mainly taken up by the lawyers; but there was plenty of opportunity for the business men and merchants, as many as there are in this body, to have submitted their views.

I repeat that I do not want to put the Senator at all under pressure: but certainly, under the circumstances, he can not object to naming an hour for a vote upon the bill. We want to give the Senator full opportunity to debate it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, just a word in reply to the statement of the Senator from Nevada that this bill has been under discussion for six weeks.

Early in the debate that was going on upon this bill I stated to the Senate, on an occasion when a similar agreement was asked for, that I did not feel that I could discuss the bill until I knew what was going to be reported in regard to the matter from the Judiciary Committee. The bill under consideration by the Judiciary Committee was reported here on July 22. That was about a week ago. In that bill there are important duties assigned to the trade commission. I think the duties that are assigned to the trade commission in that bill are a very strong argument against the establishment of a trade commission at all. Instead of there being, as the Senator very properly said as regards the trade commission bill, six weeks devoted to the discussion of this question, the whole subject has been before the Senate for only about a week, which is a very different proposition.

Under the circumstances, in the position in which I am, I shall object to any such agreement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator state whether he would be willing to fix an hour to-morrow for a vote?

Mr. LIPPITT. No; I shall object to any hour being fixed to-morrow. As I have just said, the amendment which I have offered covers a very basic principle. I shall want to discuss it a little myself. I know that some of the other Senators here wish to discuss it also, and I think that the debate can go on here upon these other bills. Here is the judiciary bill, the Clayton bill; they are all involved together. The instant you pass this bill you have got to go on and consider the Clayton bill, which is interlocked with it.

As a plain matter of fact, in consideration of the situation that now faces the civilized world, I believe this legislation ought not to be considered at all in this body. We are facing perhaps the greatest catastrophe that the world has known since the days of Noah and the great flood. We are facing a situation where the business men, the trade, and the commerce of this country are going to be called upon to face problems of whose importance no one can make an estimate at this time. Whatever is going to be the ultimate result of this legislation, the immediate result is going to be to present a number of new and very trying problems to the people actively engaged in the business of this country.

It seems to me that in view of the unparalleled situation—unparalleled so far as the records of authentic history go—to attempt to force these disturbing measures upon the business of the country at this time is very ill advised. I had hoped that in view of the situation the gentlemen on the other side who are responsible for the affairs of this country would have taken it under consideration and would perhaps have decided that the action upon this legislation should go over until next December. I think it is the only proper way for this body to act on the subject at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that I believe the adjustment of these questions now will tend toward industrial peace, and that it would be a great mistake to postpone their consideration.

I will ask the Senator whether he can name the time that he desires, and the time that those desire who he is informed wish to speak upon the bill? Are we to understand from the Senator that he is so much opposed to the present consideration of the bill that he will resort to every parliamentary means to prevent its passage?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator right here that I will resort to no parliamentary means that are in the nature of a filibuster in connection with the consideration of this bill, unless the other side of the Chamber attempts to resort to cloture measures. I have no disposition to do it, and I think no Member on this side of the Chamber has the slightest intention of doing anything of the kind. I will say frankly to the Senator that such a thought was brought up a short time ago in an informal conference of some of the Senators on this side who are opposed to this bill, and it was decided that no such step should be resorted to.

So far as I am concerned, I have no doubt that in the course of two or three days I shall have said all I can think of or want to say on this matter; and I have no doubt that in due course shortly, if this bill continues to be pushed on the other side, it will come to a vote. But, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Nevada is very anxious to have the bill go through, and he has listened with some credulity to the whispers of fancy in regard to the matter, and I think he has thought something was going to happen, when there was little possibility of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, is the Senator willing to fix a time—day after to-morrow—when we can vote?

Mr. LIPPITT. No, Mr. President, I am not ready to-day to fix a time in regard to the matter at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I see no recourse——

Mr. LIPPITT. So far as I am concerned, I shall be quite willing to vote upon the bill in the course of two or three or four days—some time this week. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I see no recourse, then, but to go on with the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Upon the appeal I ask for the yeas and nays. I simply want to make this final observation about the matter. Of course our friends on the other side think it is within their power to declare that a violation of an order is a rescission of it, but I warn them that if that is made the rule of the Senate by a vote of the Senate the day will come when it will not be a very creditable precedent to point to.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me ask the Senator a question. The rule said "until otherwise ordered." "Otherwise ordered" by whom? Otherwise ordered by the Senate. The Senate ordered an adjournment under the terms of the rule.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Virginia think that if we had taken a recess at 5 o'clock that would have been a rescission of the order? Does not the Senator from Virginia understand the difference between a violation of an order and setting it aside?

Mr. SWANSON. It is no violation, because the very order itself provides that it shall continue until otherwise ordered. It is no violation of an order when the Senate orders it otherwise. It was no violation of the order, but it was simply to continue until the Senate should otherwise order. Does the Senator think we can make a rule like that that will continue eternally and have unanimous consent for it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may be satisfied with his own reasoning. Without intending to be at all offensive, because I am very fond of the Senator, I want to compliment him by saying that he is the prince of sophists.

Mr. SWANSON. I will compliment the Senator further by saying that he has a great deal of force and a great deal of insistence to argue against doing precisely what the Senate had a right to order to do. I now ask the Senator this question: Could the Senate get rid of this order except by unanimous consent under the Senator's theory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It can get rid of it my unanimous consent, of course, or by another order.

Mr. SWANSON. It did make another order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. It ordered otherwise.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. SWANSON. It did. It made another order for adjournment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no. An adjournment over one day will not put an end to an order that recess shall be taken from day to day, which is a general and continuing order.

Mr. SWANSON. Is not that an order?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Any vote of the Senate is an order.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the difference between one order and another?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think that if we had taken a recess on Saturday at 5 o'clock instead of 6 o'clock that would have put an end to the order?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; if we had taken a recess at 5 o'clock that would have been another order; yes.

Mr. KERN. With the permission of the Senator from Rhode Island, who has said something about the action of this side of the Chamber and has made some statements as to what he will do, provided Members on this side do so-and-so, I want to assure him that the proposition to proceed with the discussion of this measure to-night came from both sides of the Chamber. It was not a partisan proposition. There is nothing partisan about it. There is a very general desire that this legislation shall be put behind us.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator be willing to state who were the Members on this side of the Chamber?

Mr. KERN. I do not propose to be cross-examined. The friends on this side who have spoken to me on this subject will know to whom I refer.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to know who they were.

Mr. KERN. The Senator can find out from them. The Senator will not question me, however, on the proposition, but the proposition is simply actuated by a desire to get this bill behind us.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LIPPITT. Just a minute before the Senator from Iowa speaks, if I may be allowed to continue. I should like to state to the Senator from Indiana that what I meant was the Senators on this side of the question, not on this side of the floor, though I may have said "floor." By Senators upon this side of the question I meant the Senators who are opposed to the passage of this measure. They have not filibustered or in any way attempted to do it, and they have no disposition to do it and will not throw any impediment in the way of the passage of the bill unless such measures are resorted to on the other side. Then I do not know what they will do. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe that the ruling of the Chair is right, and I intend to vote to sustain the ruling. At the same time I feel that it is very unfortunate and very unfair in view of all the circumstances that the Senator from Rhode Island should be required to proceed to-night with an argument that I know he has had it in mind to make during all the while that the bill has been under consideration. I think the ruling of the Chair is right, because when the Senate voted to adjourn it ordered otherwise than to take a recess at 6 o'clock and convene the next morning without the morning hour. The Senator from Utah will remember that there was a similar order made by the Senate some time before the order of a week ago to-day, which required the Senate to take a recess at 6 o'clock and convene at 11 o'clock, and that one afternoon when there was no quorum here the Senate was finally adjourned in the absence of a quorum, and that adjournment was by common consent held to be a recision of the former order for a recess.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The order that was in force at that time was an order for that day, and that day only. It was an order made in the morning that when the hour of 6 o'clock arrived at that day a recess should be taken until the following day. Of course that was not a continuing order. When the Senate adjourned that was the end of that order. It would have been the end of it if we had taken a recess. It did not operate the next day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know there was a difference between the former order and the last one, but it seems to me there is a striking similarity still between the effect the adjournment had because there was no quorum and the adjournment Saturday night.

I dislike to see any difference of opinion with regard to this technical matter, and I appeal to the other side of the Chamber with regard to the further consideration of this bill—a bill in which I am just as deeply interested as anyone here—that it would be most unhappy at this juncture to enforce the further consideration of the bill to-night and require the Senator from Rhode Island to continue with his observations. I know, and all of you know, that the Senator from Rhode Island has made no attempt to obstruct the consideration of the bill. I accept his assurance, given in a public way, as I have heard him frequently express himself in a private way, that he had no purpose to delay a final vote upon the bill beyond the period of fair and adequate argument and consideration. I hope there will be some way in which this matter may be adjusted, and that we can come together to-morrow morning and hear the Senator from Rhode Island for the length of time he desires to address the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to inquire what is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HUGHES. Has a motion to lay the appeal on the table been entertained by the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have asked for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUGHES. On the appeal, not on the motion to lay on the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No motion to lay upon the table has been entertained.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I think I have the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I shall not keep the Senator from the floor long.

Mr. LIPPITT. By yielding to the Senator from Arkansas I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator will soon have it. Mr. President, I can not treat with seriousness the proposition that the ruling of the Chair is in the slightest doubt. The fiction of taking a recess from day to day and preserving the parliamentary day or establishing distinctions between a parliamentary day and a calendar day so far was for the purpose of getting rid of a certain rule requiring the consideration of morning business. It has a certain definite use when there is a protracted debate on hand and when the expectation is that time will be unnecessarily consumed. The rule of the Senate is a courteous recognition of the right of every Senator as measured by his own demand until it becomes perfectly evident that there is a concerted movement to delay proceedings, as they have been delayed for the betterment of the laws and institutions of this country on certain occasions. I do not know that an occasion of that importance will occur again in a short time, but the filibuster has been worth all it has ever cost up to the present time.

I believe that when there is a change in the processes of the Senate there ought to be fair notice given. The intention to have this night session has been agitated for about two hours, so far as my knowledge extends. I do not believe that the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Nevada ought to insist upon a night session to-night. I think that the usual order to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow should be made, with a definite understanding that at that time, if the conditions of the bill seem to make it proper, we will, without any attempt to take snap judgment on anybody, continue the session until the bill has been disposed of. I think it can be disposed of at to-morrow's session on that condition, but I do not believe we would well preserve the high recognition of the rights of Senators, as we have heretofore understood them, by common consent if we should proceed to-night.

I hope the Senator from Indiana will relieve us of the necessity of remaining here to-night. I intend to stand by this bill and do whatever those in charge of it think we ought to do to pass it, but I would prefer to do some other things to-night.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator is mistaken in his assumption that this matter was considered but two hours ago.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I only heard it about two hours since. If I did not say that I say it now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Last Saturday night there was a general understanding that we would have a night session to-night and dispose of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Nothwithstanding that I think we ought not to insist on a session to-night. There is other work that some of us can do. There is an important meeting of Senators from the cotton region to-night for the purpose of determining whether or not there is anything which can be done to relieve an acute situation that will soon begin to make itself manifest in the cotton-growing district. The time will not be lost.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I think I have the floor, but I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am exceedingly reluctant to press the Senator from Rhode Island to speak to-night. He is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee and has taken a prominent part in all our deliberations. He has a right to be heard, and we want to hear him. I regret that he has not seized an opportunity, however, prior to this time. I think there is a general sentiment on this side, after a discussion of the matter, that we should not press a continuous session to-night, but I give notice that from this time we shall press a continuous session, and that to-morrow night we shall have a night session.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I wish to call attention for just a minute to the parliamentary situation also. As the amendment which I started to speak on about an hour ago has been accepted by the committee and by the chairman of the committee, that, in accordance with the previous ruling of the Chair that the acceptance of an amendment by the chairman of the committee does away with the necessity of any vote, the chairman having accepted it, it is now a part of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair has never so ruled.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the point of order that an appeal is pending and that it is not subject to debate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I have made the point of order the Chair thought I had, and the Senators generally think I did, and an appeal was taken from it, to relieve that situation I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I think I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. Rule XX provides that all appeals shall be decided without debate.

Mr. SMOOT. The appeal has been withdrawn.

Mr. SWANSON. The appeal has not been withdrawn. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] made an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I took the appeal. What is the proposition of the Senator? I do not understand it.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the Senator made an appeal from the decision of the Chair that the order made last Monday was revoked by adjournment last Saturday. The Senator from Utah made an appeal from that decision?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the point of order that it is not debatable. I ask for the decision of the Chair upon my point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no point of order before the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I give notice that there will be a continuous session maintained to-morrow until this bill is disposed of. I now move that we take a recess.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is, the Senator means an attempt will be made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. KORBLY, and Mr. HAYES managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 312) for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

RECESS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 4, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 3, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, ever present in the hearts of Thy children to uphold, sustain, and guide them in right thinking and noble living, we thank Thee for the holy Sabbath day, which takes us, if we will, out of the busy whirl and turmoil of life's activities not only to quiet and rest, but to a contemplation of the sacred relationship to Thee and our fellow men. Lead us by Thy counsels through this day that we may reflect Thy glory in thought and deed and leave behind us something noble, something that shall live a blessing to mankind. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 1, 1914, was read and approved.

MINORITY VIEWS—H. R. 15191.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present the views of the minority of the Committee on the District of Columbia in reference to House bill 15191, in accordance with the special action of the House. (H. Rept. 917, pt. 2.)

The SPEAKER. That goes through the basket.

CLERK PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits the following communication from the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

JULY 31, 1914.

Mr. SPEAKER: Desiring to be absent for a time from my office, I hereby designate D. K. Hempstead, one of my assistants, to act in my official capacities during my absence.

Very respectfully, SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINDEL. To a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I have been charged by the press, or rather by my colleague, Mr. KEATING, who is quoted in the press of the country and more specifically in the New York Sun of July 10 last, as follows:

Representative KEATING, of Colorado, who has been at odds with Representative KINDEL over the strike situation in the State, took occasion to-day to make some caustic comments about his colleague. In the debates in the House on the Colorado strike situation Mr. KEATING upheld the cause of the miners. Mr. KINDEL assailed the labor unions and took occasion one day to eulogize John D. Rockefeller.

"Any man who eulogizes John D. Rockefeller has no place in the Democratic Party," said Representative KEATING to-day. Referring directly to Mr. KINDEL, Mr. KEATING said:

"He is an attorney for the express companies in the House and never knew for a moment what the Democratic platform contained."

Mr. KEATING'S excuse for mentioning Mr. KINDEL'S name in connection with the express companies is the activity shown by Mr. KINDEL in opposing extensions of the parcel-post system.

My being an employed agent of the express companies or opposing extension of parcel post is absurd and malicious, all of which I deny. If that were true, I should not be a worthy Member of this body, and I should summarily be impeached. I challenge the allegation. I challenge the proof. Not only have these reports come to me from various parts of the country, but I see in Saturday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he again states what I have stated as to the Colorado situation to be untrue, and I take exception to that.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of privilege unless it involves something said in the House, but the gentleman's first statement is a question of privilege.

Mr. KINDEL. The first statement I did not want to pay any attention to at all, but since his false assertion in his Monument speech was repeated in the RECORD of Saturday I could not let it go unchallenged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a question of privilege.

Mr. KINDEL. I accept the Speaker's correction.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any speech to make about it?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes; very briefly. I want to say I hereby challenge Mr. KEATING or the newspapers that quoted him to make proof; to make good what they have said as to my being the hired attorney of any or all express companies. I want to say that, on the contrary, I was the first man in these United States to attack the rates of the express companies before the Interstate Commerce Commission after the Hepburn law went into effect; that by my first effort I succeeded in reducing the express rate from New York to Denver from $8.50 a hundred to $8, and by my second attempt at a correction of these outrageous rates toward my city and State we succeeded in reducing rates from $8 to $5.70 a hundred. I want to say that if either of three of my graduates of parcel-post rates were adopted there would be no need of any express companies, that I could take the express rates as received by them and pay to the railroads 50 per cent more than the express companies are paying them, and if Mr. Burleson's statement is right in the pickup and delivery cost I can beat the express rates by 30 per cent and the parcel-post rate by 50 per cent in the eastern territory, and also substantially reduce those in the western territory. I propose to go into this parcel-post rate matter more fully on a later day. I want to deny most emphatically the absurd or malicious allegation of Mr. KEATING that I am the hired man of any corporation of any kind, and I stand here ready to be investigated and challenge the proof. [Applause.]

EMERGENCY CURRENCY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of the bill (S. 6192) and to call it up for immediate action.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of Senate bill 6192 and to take up the same for immediate consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, let the Clerk report the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows.

"SEC. 27. The provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, authorizing national currency associations, the issue of additional national-bank circulation, and creating a National Monetary Commission, which expires by limitation under the terms of such act on the 30th day of June, 1914, are hereby extended to June 30, 1915, and sections 5153, 5172, 5191, and 5214 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which were amended by the act of May 30, 1908, are hereby reenacted to read as such sections read prior to May 30, 1908, subject to such amendments or modifications as are prescribed in this act: Provided, however, That section 9 of the act first referred to in this section is hereby amended so as to change the tax rates fixed in said act by making the portion applicable thereto read as follows:

"National banking associations having circulating notes secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall pay for the first three months a tax at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such securities, and afterwards an additional tax rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum for each month until a tax of 6 per cent per annum is reached, and thereafter such tax of 6 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such notes: Provided further, That whenever in his judgment he may deem it desirable, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to suspend the limitations imposed by section 1 and section 3 of the act referred to in this section, which prescribe that such additional circulation secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall be issued only to national banks having circulating notes outstanding secured by the deposit of bonds of the United States to an amount not less than 40 per cent of the capital stock of such banks, and may permit national banks, during the period for which such provisions are suspended, to issue additional circulation under the terms and conditions of the act referred to."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do so because I want a record vote upon this bill—can the gentleman from Virginia tell us a way in which we can have a record vote upon this bill by allowing his request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Why, the bill is to be voted upon like any other bill. If anybody demands the yeas and nays, and gets enough to stand up with him he can get a record vote.

Mr. GLASS. I am sure I have no objection to a record vote.

The SPEAKER. This is simply unanimous consent to consider the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Virginia his purpose in reference to the bill. What does he propose to do?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To pass it.

Mr. GLASS. To pass it and let it be sent to the Senate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman in favor of a record vote upon this proposition?

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection whatever, but it has not occurred to me anybody would object to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will yield to me——

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that it is necessary to pass this bill this morning on account of the financial conditions in New York. Nobody, of course, would object to a record vote. Now, the banking and currency bill, known as the Glass bill, under the ruling of the Attorney General, can not become effective until the full board is made up, and it can not relieve this situation for that reason. Even if the full board were confirmed and sworn in this morning it would take 30 days to print the notes under that bill and get them in circulation.

Now, the critical part of the situation in New York rose out of the war conditions in Europe. The exchanges in all of Europe have closed, necessitating the closing of the New York Exchange. As the gentleman well knows, a large amount of money is loaned in New York on call loans on securities that are sold in the exchange. When the New York Exchange closed indefinitely it closed that market. All call loans became immediately time loans, and there is no chance for the New York banks to realize on them. The banks in the balance of the country are calling for their reserve on New York, with no opportunity for New York to realize on these securities. It is therefore necessary to have an emergency currency that can take effect at once. Five hundred million dollars have already been printed and are ready for use under the Aldrich-Vreeland currency law. The Secretary of the Treasury is now in New York City. If this bill goes through immediately that situation can be relieved before the banks close.

Now, if it is not relieved it may produce a financial panic in this country such as we have not known heretofore. I do not know whether there is a quorum in town or not. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] can insist on a call if he desires to do so. If a quorum is here, it will not injure the situation, but if it develops that a quorum of this House is not here, and it forces this bill to go over until to-morrow, the gentleman would be responsible for a very grave situation.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I shall vote against this bill. I think I understand, in part, at least, the situation in New York City and in the world. I would like to have a record vote upon this proposition, and I will ask him if he will help me get the record vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that I have no objection to a record vote. I shall vote for the bill, and am perfectly willing to go on record for it. I have no doubt that every Member on this side of the House is willing to go on record to show that he is willing to meet an emergency condition in this country. [Applause.] But I can not agree, unless it is forced, that I shall ask for a record vote when I do not know whether it will develop in a quorum being in this House or not.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Is not this proposition now to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill out of order?

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Kansas is sufficiently familiar with the rules to know that when a vote upon this bill is taken in the House, if he should make a point of no quorum, he will take the responsibility on himself when he raises the point.

Mr. MURDOCK. "The gentleman from Kansas" also knows that if he objects probably the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] will make a motion to suspend the rules, and there will be at least 20 minutes debate on each side, which I think ought to be given to the measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, there is no desire on the part of the gentleman from Virginia not to allow 20 minutes on a side if unanimous consent is given.

Mr. MURDOCK. I regret that the gentleman from Alabama will not join in getting a record vote. You can do it in this House very easily. I am going to get a record vote if I can.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I will not object to a record vote, but I think it is a dangerous proposition at this time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. LINDBERGH. The gentleman, of course, knows this is a very important bill, and I have no desire to obstruct it at all. What I want to know is this: It seems to me there ought to be some little time for the consideration of the bill. I do not mean sufficient time to pass it over for a day or anything of that kind, but if there is not time, on account of the financial stringency, I think the Members ought to have the right to put in the RECORD a few lines in regard to it, so that they may be understood.

Mr. GLASS. I will say that I have no desire to foreclose debate on the proposition. I suggest we have an hour's time, although I can not imagine why we should want to debate the proposition for an hour. I have no objection to discussion or leave to print.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I think that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] purpose to have some debate on this proposition?

Mr. GLASS. I have just suggested that we may have an hour's debate on it if it is desired on that side. I do not think anybody on this side wants to discuss the proposition. I had not wished to discuss it further than to explain it, but that has already been done by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

I will say to the House that I made every possible effort to get a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee on Saturday to consider this bill and failed twice to get a quorum. Then I communicated with all the members in town whom I could reach by telephone, explained what the bill was, and none of them objected to the immediate consideration and passage of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] what effect this will have on the application of the new currency bill if the new reserve board is organized?

Mr. GLASS. I do not think it will affect it at all. The fact is, if the board were organized and the new reserve system in force, there would be no necessity for repealing this statute. It is only because the system is not completely organized that we must resort to this.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. For a question.

Mr. MADDEN. The board would have exactly the same power to suspend the law that this bill gives now if it was organized?

Mr. GLASS. Exactly.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all. This bill gives the authority to suspend the law before the organization of the board? As a matter of fact, under the Glass bill, the bill as——

Mr. GLASS. This bill confers on the Secretary of the Treasury the same powers that the reserve act confers on the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to ask the gentleman the reason for the proposed reduction in the rate of interest. I inferred from the resolution that the rate of interest is to be materially reduced.

Mr. GLASS. Not at all. The rate of interest was reduced by an amendment embodied in the Federal reserve act.

Mr. HAUGEN. I had reference to the Vreeland bill, and it is the Vreeland bill we are now undertaking to amend.

Mr. GLASS. That was done last December, when we passed the Federal reserve act.

Mr. HAUGEN. Why not make the rate of interest what it ought to be and make it a real emergency currency and not to accommodate certain speculators?

Mr. GLASS. The rate is what Congress determined last December it should be.

Mr. HAUGEN. Why not correct the error now?

Mr. GLASS. We see no necessity for it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The currency act recently passed repealed all parts of the so-called Aldrich-Vreeland bill inconsistent therewith.

Mr. GLASS. It extended the operation of the act 12 months—from June 30 1914, to June 30, 1915.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then there is nothing inconsistent with it?

Mr. GLASS. No. There is nothing inconsistent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] objects.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, and pass it with amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send them up and have them read into the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I send them up to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] moves to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from further consideration of Senate bill 6192, and pass the same, including the amendments which the Clerk will read into it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is the engrossed copy of the Senate bill here?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has it. It was on its way over to the committee. The Clerk will read the Senate bill, and read it with the amendments. Where does the proviso come in?

Mr. GLASS. At the end of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the bill has already been read.

The SPEAKER. It has not been read under this motion.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems to me it would be more intelligible if it were read in its amended form.

The SPEAKER. It has not been read under this motion. The Clerk will read the bill, and read the amendments into it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"SEC. 27. The provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, authorizing national currency associations, the issue of additional national-bank circulation, and creating a National Monetary Commission, which expires by limitation under the terms of such act on the 30th day of June, 1914, are hereby extended to June 30, 1915, and sections 5153, 5172, 5191, and 5214 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which were amended by the act of May 30, 1908, are hereby reenacted to read as such sections read prior to May 30, 1908, subject to such amendments or modifications as are prescribed in this act: Provided, however, That section 9 of the act first referred to in this section is hereby amended so as to change the tax rates fixed in said act by making the portion applicable thereto read as follows:

"National banking associations having circulating notes secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States, shall pay for the first three months a tax at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such securities, and afterwards an additional tax rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum for each month until a tax of 6 per cent per annum is reached, and thereafter such tax of 6 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such notes: Provided further, That whenever in his judgment he may deem it desirable, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to suspend the limitations imposed by section 1 and section 3 of the act referred to in this section, which prescribe that such additional circulation secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall be issued only to national banks having circulating notes outstanding secured by the deposit of bonds of the United States to an amount not less than 40 per cent of the capital stock of such banks, and to suspend also the conditions and limitations of section 5 of said act, and may permit national banks, during the period for which such provisions are suspended, to issue additional circulation under the terms and conditions of the act referred to: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is further authorized to extend the benefits of this act to all qualified State banks and trust companies which have joined the Federal reserve system, or which may contract to join within 15 days after the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MURDOCK. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can we not have some understanding about an extension of the time for debate? We want a little time; I want a little time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want only four or five minutes.

Mr. GLASS. I will yield to the gentleman half of my time.

Mr. HAYES. I want a few minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will yield half of my time.

Mr. MANN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering a second as ordered?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] for 20 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill was passed by the Senate by unanimous consent. It came to the House, and the understanding we have from the press is that the measure was to pass the House without further amendment. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, however, has presented it to the House this morning with an amendment which appears to improve it materially. As the bill passed the Senate, and as it was intended in the first instance to propose it for passage in the House, it was unmistakably giving aid to the investment bankers, principally in New York City, at the expense of the discount bankers over the country.

Now, I am not easily rushed off my feet by the cry of great exigency. I know that from dynastic or from personal or from racial reasons Europe has come to the brink of war, and I am aware that, incident to that conflict which is impending, for four or five days of last week American stocks were unloaded upon the stock market in New York City, in particular on one day—Thursday of last week—because practically all the other stock exchanges in the world were closed although London was not. Friday the New York exchange was closed. Since there has followed rumor of financial difficulty in New York City, as was to be expected, and a demand from that source for money. Under the provisions of existing law for the issue of emergency currency the New York banks could not obtain the amount they desired, because under that law banks are not entitled to this emergency currency unless they have outstanding in national-bank notes based on Government bonds not less than 40 per cent of their capital—one of the chief safeguards of stability in the old Vreeland law. Now, the New York banks do not have a sufficient amount of Government bonds on hand. They want this provision repealed. This bill takes that safeguard away. Ordinarily its repeal would not pass Congress without days of debate if it could be passed at all. But there now arises here in Washington the cry of necessity for immediate action. There is apparently now no emergency equaling the necessity of immediate succor for those whose practices in New York City in 1907 resulted in the original passage of the Vreeland emergency currency measure.

In 1908, following the money flurry of 1907, there appeared in the House the original Vreeland bill. It was not possible to get a report favorable to that bill out of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Republican machine in this House forced it through the House under the cry of "exigency" without a report from the committee. It was opposed upon the Democratic side of the House largely—I think unanimously—because it did not sufficiently safeguard the redemption funds in the United States Treasury, because it gave too great a power to the Secretary of the Treasury, and because it discriminated in favor of the speculating investment bankers as against the discount bankers of the country. The bill was put through the House and finally became a law. When the time came to pass the Glass currency bill the provisions of this law were incorporated in the Glass currency bill and passed the Congress.

Now, again, under the cry of "exigency," taken in good faith by many, we are to change it again, granting greater power than ever to the Secretary of the Treasury, exposing again the redemption funds of the United States, and putting a further burden upon them, possibly to the hurt of the credit of the United States; and despite the amendment offered here this morning by the gentleman from Virginia, making it still possible to say of the bill that it is a life line to investment bankers as against the men who do a discounting business in the country, and a life line which, if any such difficulty as is alleged exists, will not reach and will not remedy.

This bill will pass. It will pass against an unavailing protest here, as it passed one time previously when the camel was getting his nose into the flap of the tent. The measure is back here once more, with its provisions relaxed in favor of those in New York, who, in part, have brought this condition upon the country. I say to gentlemen here, after you have passed this bill, after you have tried to cure this situation by the remedy of inflation, which is ordinarily, in situations of this kind, no remedy at all, a remedy before which gold always hides and moves out of the country, it will be only a few months until the camel will be entirely in the tent, until the men from New York, who are here to-day asking for this legislation, will be back asking that the tax-retirement rate be repealed, and in that emergency we will be asked again to vote in their behalf. I shall vote against this bill, and my present intention is that there shall be a record vote.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves 14 minutes.

Mr. GLASS. I would be glad to have the gentleman from Kansas yield further time, because there will be but one speech on this side. I expect to yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is merely an enlargement of the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency act, as the bill itself shows. I voted against that act, and shall, for the same reasons which guided me then, vote against this bill.

It is rather strange that Congress acts so quickly to help out the speculators in emergencies, when neither the farmers nor the wage earners can secure legislation, however urgent it may be, if it is opposed by the same interests that seek this legislation. Our finances are on a wrong basis. I have so stated many times here. The very fact that this bill is demanded proves it. But this bill would not correct the financial system. The system, as it is, promotes speculation, and every few years speculators get into a tight place by reason of complications of one kind and another. Nine times out of ten it is of their own creation. In 1907 we had a panic, when all the natural conditions were the very best for good times. It was of Wall Street creation. The farmers, wageworkers, smaller business interests, and some of the larger business interests that were not under the wings of the Money Trust magnates were the losers. Now, we have a foreign war scare, which is assuming immense magnitude, so we are again asked to aid the speculators. Already they have been buying stocks in quantities which they had previously sold to Europe. They have used the deposits that the plain people have in the banks to make purchases. They use that money, the people's deposits, to send abroad for the stocks. It is paid in gold. Now they wish $500,000,000 and more of United States notes to be issued to pay the depositors if the depositors demand cash; and if they do not, then for the reenforcement of further speculation.

We probably have an emergency. I really think there is one; but it is one created by the speculators having put themselves in a position to be affected by a foreign war; and if they can get this act passed, they will dare to speculate more on the results of the war, for if they get cornered they can come to Uncle Sam for $500,000,000 and upward. If they do not get cornered, they need not take this money. It gives them the option. I am in favor of meeting the emergency, but not with more legislation in favor of the speculators. I will support any measure that would supply the people with all the credit and money that are needed to make the exchanges that arise out of the country's legitimate commerce. The legislation that is proposed this morning is to bridge the speculators over an emergency they have encountered. Let us pass a bill instead to bridge over any emergency that may come to the farmers, the wageworkers, the commerce, and other legitimate enterprises.

Some of us have been working for years to pass a rural-credit bill, to form a system that would really accomplish permanent good to the farming and other interests that form the basis for our existence, but the rural-credit bill can not be gotten on the floor for consideration by unanimous consent nor by any other means that the House adopts. Every obstacle is put in its way. Why? Simply because it is opposed by the speculators, the very ones whom it is proposed to pass this emergency bill for. Congress acts for them when, by obstructive methods, the farming and other legitimate business interests are left without a remedy for any emergency. The speculators are mere parasites, but still they get what they ask. The farming and other legitimate interests render the service that civilization demands, but when they wish credit or money they are forced to pay exorbitant prices because speculators are given a monopoly in the supply of credit and money.

I would adopt no obstructive measures to stop the passage of a bill that the majority wishes, for every Member is the representative of a district, and a majority have authority and power, if they exercise it, to pass through the House any kind of a bill they wish.

It has been indicated by some of the speeches this morning that Wall Street has notified us that a panic will start before night unless this bill is passed. That would be another panic started by Wall Street. It is about time that we passed a bill that would forever prevent Wall Streeters from turning up here every few years demanding the passage of measures to suit their purposes in order to stop panics started by their instrumentality. I am ready to vote for such a bill, but not this bill. It has become more and more difficult for the "special interests" to secure special legislation in their interest in normal times, but now, with a war scare on, they come out boldly, and, under the guise of the scare, they expect Members to give them what they ask.

We are passing a large number of bills in this Congress with big and popular names but with mighty little material substance of value. Most of them are harmless, except that they serve to make believe and cause the public to wait to try them. No one finds it easier to make a living after these bills are passed. They will not give the relief that the public demands.

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I can see no objection to the passage of this bill. The reserve act passed some eight months ago extended the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, which by limitation would have expired on June 30 of this year, to June 30, 1915, so that this bill, although the language might give such an impression, does not have the effect of extending the Vreeland-Aldrich bill one day.

Two things are accomplished by this bill. One is to permit banks which have less than 40 per cent of national-bank notes based on United States bonds in circulation to take advantage of the act, which under the present law they could not do. This will give relief to such banks as the Chemical National Bank. As I recall, that bank is one of those having less than 40 per cent of circulation based on bonds. This bill will give them an opportunity to come in on the same basis as banks which have more than 40 per cent and get some of this emergency currency.

The other effect will be to permit the State banks and trust companies, which, under the reserve act if it were in operation, would be entitled to currency, to come in and get currency when otherwise they could not.

I regret that the gentlemen on the other side of the House thought it necessary to pass this sort of legislation at this time. All except a very small percentage of the national banks are entitled to emergency currency under the present law, and the rush to get this legislation on the statute book may, I am afraid, give the country a wrong impression of the present situation, which, I think, is not so critical as to cause great apprehension on the part of anybody. There is an unprecedented condition abroad, to be sure, but our banks are all in fine condition. There has been no great speculation for months. Liquidation has been going on for years in this country, and if we are not in a position now to stand the strain that is put upon us I do not know when we shall be.

It seems to me it is proper that I should call to your attention the fact that the Federal reserve act was passed eight months ago by this Congress, and I believe that the party in power has been almost criminally negligent in that at this time the Federal Reserve Board is not even appointed, and no adequate steps have been taken to organize under the law that was passed at that time. It seems to me that the exercise of ordinary diligence would have had the system inaugurated by the Federal reserve act in full operation long before this, which would have provided, I hope, for all emergencies at this time without the necessity of this piecework legislation. But, as I say, in the situation in which we find ourselves, I can see no possible objection to the passage of this bill. It is not in the interest of any particular class of our people or of any particular class of banks. It simply puts all the banks on the same basis and gives them all the chance to help themselves and the business of the country by the issuance of the emergency currency which the present law provides, and that is all. Therefore I shall vote for the bill. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one-half minute.

Mr. GLASS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the world is to-day confronted with the most serious situation which history records. There never has been a time during the life of humanity when there was such danger to nations, to individuals, to economic situations, to trade and commerce as threatens the world to-day. In times like this certainly we ought to rise above partisanship [applause] and seek to do that which is for the good of our own people, our own country; aye, of the world itself. [Applause.] I think I might properly criticize the present administration for not having put into force the currency law. And yet this is not the time for criticism. This is the time to follow the lead of men who must be in command [applause] and to do those things which may render the threatened disaster of less effect than it would be if we did nothing. [Applause.] I do not know whether this bill is necessary or not. I do not pause to ascertain. It certainly does no more than would be done under the existing law if that were in actual operation. [Applause.] It seeks to meet the emergency by giving more effective operation to a law which we Republicans passed following the panic of 1907. There was partisanship when it was enacted, and properly so. Now, in face of the emergency, the majority side of Congress and the administration properly seek to make use of that law which is upon the statute books, amending it slightly so as to make it more effective. I hope that war in Europe will not come. I hope that the clouds that now are so black and threatening may clear away before the sunshine of common sense and prudence, but when the threat comes, when the danger exists, let us be statesmen, put aside partisanship, and remember only the good of our people and the good of our country. [Loud applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois yields back five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, to-day we are neither Democrats nor Republicans. [Applause.] We are American patriots. We are following the lead of the man who is in control of the affairs of the Nation, whose duty it is to tell us what the emergency is. The emergency is here. It ought to be met and should be met promptly, and it will be. There ought to be no division of sentiment as to what is the best thing to do. The emergency is not of our creation. It is created by conditions abroad. We must not let that condition embarrass us and our people, and we can prevent that embarrassment best by the enactment of this legislation. I am heartily in favor of the immediate consideration and enactment of this law [applause], which gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to suspend the existing law.

This power now given to the Secretary of the Treasury is but temporary in its character. That same power exists under the Glass law in the Federal Reserve Board. If they were organized they would have the power to suspend the law for 30 days, and if the emergency then was not over they would still have the power for 15 days at a time to continue that suspension indefinitely.

Our people look to the Congress of the United States to meet whatever emergency may arise, and we can not cover up our responsibility or evade it by the mere statement of the fact that the recommendation was made either by a Democrat or a Republican. [Applause.] Patriotism should be on guard now as never before, for I know of no such emergency as that which now exists having existed in the history of this Nation. I hope that the wisdom of the people abroad will lead to the cessation of hostilities and that peace will prevail, not only there but everywhere throughout the world. [Applause.] Our duty, so long as the emergency does exist, is to protect inviolate American institutions and to do that which is for the best good of every American, man, woman, and child, wherever they may be. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Illinois and his party in the patriotism they are showing to-day [applause] in laying aside party lines and party differences and recognizing that under the stress of present conditions there are no party lines; that there is but one country and one Commander in Chief. [Applause.]

The situation that confronts us to-day is not of our creation and does not arise from conditions that are existent on this side of the ocean. We all know that a vast deal of our business is done by credit and not by money; that our credit system far exceeds our money conditions. As long as conditions are normal there is a dollar in existence to take care of credit conditions when the necessity arises.

But all Europe has begun to hoard gold. Every demand will be made on this country for its gold supply. If we were in a condition to market our crops, that gold supply would return to us shortly, but in this hour and this time we yet have that condition to face. Every man in this House knows that under the present reserve system, which will be eliminated when the full terms of the Glass currency bill take effect, a large amount of reserves in the country are in the city of New York. New York lends these reserves on call loans on securities that are sold on the stock exchange.

It was a national necessity that the stock exchange should close, in order that Europe should not dump its securities on us and take away our gold. The closing of the exchange has made time loans in place of call loans; and although these banks are solvent, there is no place for them to get the money to-day to meet the demand of your banks throughout the country when they call for the reserve.

Now, if the new currency law was in effect, that would be all taken care of. But, as I said a while ago, it will take 30 days at least to put it into effect. Something must be done, and done immediately. The Glass currency bill fortunately extends the time of this present law. The only question involved is that a good many of the banks have not issued national-bank notes up to the requirements of the law to take advantage of the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, and we did not want them to. We are proposing to retire that currency ultimately under the Glass bill. We were glad to have them dispose of the bonds and gradually contract that currency. We invited them to do it by passing the Glass bill last winter; and yet, under the conditions under which we invited them to do it under our own legislation, they can not take advantage of the present law.

This bill proposes to give them an opportunity to take advantage of it, to issue an asset currency to meet present conditions. It is not what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] says—to relieve the speculative banks in New York—but it is an effort to relieve your constituency and my constituency, to prevent cotton from selling for 5 cents a pound and wheat from selling for 25 cents a bushel. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I certainly feel as deeply as any man in this House the necessity of disregarding all kinds of partisanship and considering this bill only with reference to its effect upon the business interests of the country. There are some things in the bill of which I am afraid, and I think that entire frankness is the only thing that is proper at the present time. The issuing of $500,000,000 of new currency is, of course, a long step toward an inflated currency.

Mr. KORBLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. KORBLY. Can it be inflation if it is based upon commercial paper, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, the relation between money and credit is so close, and at the same time the relations are so complicated, that it is hard to answer that question without making a longer speech than I have time to make now.

Mr. KORBLY. Is it not the conversion of one form of credit into another form?

Mr. TEMPLE. The conversion of one form of credit into another form; but the public will not recognize these emergency bank notes as credit instruments. The general impression will be that we have issued $500,000,000 of money.

Mr. KORBLY. But the substance is what counts, is it not?

Mr. TEMPLE. No; psychology counts; the psychological condition is worthy of much consideration, and the fact that the public look upon these $500,000,000 as money will make considerable difference between these bills and other forms of credit. If this is not so, why issue it at all; why not leave the banks to get along with other forms of credit only?

However, there is one thing that will help to diminish or perhaps prevent inflation, and that is the tax on bills issued under this act. They will not go out in indefinite quantities. There is a limit of $500,000,000. That amount may all be called for, but it will not stay in circulation longer than men are willing to pay the tax upon it. That is the one safeguard that the bill affords. Another danger that I am afraid of is the encouragement of the exportation of gold. If we furnish a sufficient quantity of paper money to do the business of the country we will release the gold for foreign export. Foreign necessities will not be met with our paper money.

There are, however, the same possibilities in emergency currency that could be issued under the law as it stands to-day. Almost everything could be done under existing law that can be done under the bill now under consideration. This bill changes existing law only so far as it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard certain limitations, so that he may issue these bills not only through banks that have 40 per cent of their authorized circulation already out, but that he may issue it through any national bank, and with the pending amendment he may issue it through State banks also. The difference between this and existing law is, after all, not very great, so far as the nature of the issue is concerned, and, Mr. Speaker, in spite of my misgivings, and in spite of my fears of certain things that are in the bill, I have no desire to say or do anything that will embarrass the administration in the course which it has made up its mind to take. In any case, I could not prevent it. I should prefer less haste; I should like to have the members of the House committee have time to consider this bill; but, in view of the existing conditions, and of the urgent representations of those who speak for the administration, I shall vote for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret the necessity for passing currency legislation at this time and with so little debate and consideration; but a remarkable, and probably unprecedented, condition has arisen in the banking circles of the world. Congress must throw out a life line to the bankers of the United States, else all of our people may be seriously crippled in most of their business relations. We are assured by those at the head of our Government and at the head of our Government finances, and in whom we have a right to have every confidence at a time like this, that such a situation now exists as to make this proposed legislation extraordinarily emergent. Under other circumstances I might ask for further consideration and amendment; but believing the relief asked for is needed, and needed now, and because I am further assured that genuine relief will thus be afforded to all our people, I shall vote for the bill. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

[Mr. FALCONER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I altogether participate in the broad views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I am gratified to find in this House, without respect to party, a determination to protect the interests of the American people in this emergency. I, too, could wish that we had more time for consideration of so grave a subject as is involved in the amendment of this Federal statute relating to our currency issues. But we have not the time. We are facing an exigency. I desire, however, to say that the country was never in better condition to meet an emergency. We have $1,500,000,000 of certificate gold in the United States Treasury. We have $150,000,000 of reserve gold. We have $130,000,000 of free gold, so that the Public Treasury was never in a stronger state to meet an emergency of this sort, nor were the banks of the country ever in better condition. This, however, is more than an emergency. It is a difficulty of such stupendous nature as that the like never before confronted the world. Like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I do not know whether it is absolutely necessary to take this action. I wish I did know; but whether it is necessary or not, it is desirable; it is a wise precaution, and this Congress should not hesitate one moment in view of the representations that have been made to the administration, and in turn have been made by the administration to the Congress.

We ought to pass this act without cavil and without delay. [Applause.] I am glad to observe there is little of a partisan tone in the discussion we have heard here, and I want to dissent totally and emphatically from the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that this is an effort to "protect the investment bankers of the country." I want to be frank enough to say if it were an effort to protect the investment bankers of the country, I am in favor of protecting every American interest, whether it is the investment banker or some other banker or person or class. [Applause.] But it is not an effort to protect the investment banker. Under the provisions of the statute the Secretary of the Treasury is required to apportion this emergency fund to the various geographical sections of this country, so that the proposition here is one not to protect simply the investment bankers of New York State but to protect the planters, the wheat growers of the gentleman's own State, and to enable them to move their crops and to get a just return for their labor.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that the bankers of Kansas have United States bonds upon which they can get emergency currency, and I have had no telegrams from Kansas asking for this legislation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, the bankers of the great money centers are not to be criticized for their failure to take out circulation at this time. The banking capital of this country has so rapidly and largely increased that there is not a sufficient amount of United States 2 per cent bonds to meet such an emergency as this, and for that reason the banks of the country can not put out the additional circulation required at this time. [Applause.] Of the nearly eight hundred millions of 2 per cent bonds available for circulation, seven hundred and thirty-six millions are now owned by the banks. Hence banks have little basis for additional circulation, and could not help themselves if they would, and could not help the country if they would, without this additional legislation. There is nothing extraordinary about this legislation aside from the fact that we are proposing to lodge with one public official—the Secretary of the Treasury—discretionary power, such as under the Federal reserve act we have lodged with the Federal Reserve Board. In other words, the Federal reserve system has not been fully organized, for which failure neither the administration nor this House of Congress is responsible. If the Federal reserve system were fully organized, there would be no earthly necessity for the action proposed here to-day, but the Attorney General of the United States, having expressed the opinion that the Federal Reserve Board can not organize until all seven members shall have been appointed and confirmed, we are now proposing to bridge the difficulty by lodging with the Secretary of the Treasury, for immediate use should occasion demand, this power already vested in the Federal Reserve Board, but which can not now be exercised by that board to meet this emergency. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary for me to further amplify the purposes——

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. HULINGS. It has been stated here in a rather vague way that there was a great emergency. Perhaps there is. Will the gentleman be good enough to state, so that the House may learn just what he thinks that emergency is, and will the gentleman also state in what particular this bill differs from the situation that now would supervene if the Federal reserve currency law were in operation?

Mr. GLASS. If the Federal reserve act were in full operation—if organization of the system had been completed—every member bank of the system, without regard to its capitalization, could rediscount every dollar of its available commercial assets under the limitations——

Mr. HULINGS. I am speaking now in respect to this particular $500,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Well, now, I have just stated that no State bank can avail itself of the existing law at all, and no national bank that has not already outstanding 40 per cent of its capital in circulation based upon United States bonds can avail itself of the provisions of the so-called Vreeland-Aldrich Act.

Mr. HULINGS. By this bill those limitations are removed.

Mr. GLASS. Are removed by these amendments; and it is provided by one of these amendments that not only the national banks of the country but all State banks and trust companies that contract to come into the Federal reserve system may avail themselves of the provisions of this law.

Mr. HULINGS. And the Secretary of the Treasury may suspend the operations of the law how long? Under this bill how long may he suspend it?

Mr. GLASS. It is, I think, possible that he will not suspend its operations at all. I very much hope that he will not have occasion to suspend. I very much hope that there may not be one dollar of this emergency currency issued. [Applause.] I apprehend that the moral effect of this action here to-day will be such that we may not have to issue one dollar of this currency.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the currency were issued under the Vreeland-Aldrich law? As I understand, the Vreeland-Aldrich law expires by limitation next year; and would not the currency have to be retired?

Mr. GLASS. It will have to be retired then under the limitations of the act; and I will say that the probability is it will be speedily retired under the tax provisions of the law.

Mr. MANN. And therefore could not possibly result in a permanent inflation——

Mr. GLASS. It could not.

Mr. MANN. Under the limitations of the law?

Mr. GLASS. It could not, because the law expires in one year.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of this bill, and pass it as read from the Clerk's desk, including what was read into it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 231, nays 6, answered "present" 5, not voting 190, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BARTHOLDT, and I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and vote "present."

The name of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the gentleman from New York, Mr. GITTINS, is recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have a pair with him. I voted "yea," but I desire to withdraw that and vote "present."

The name of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. TAYLOR. I find he did not vote. I now wish to withdraw my vote of "yea" and vote "present."

The name of Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. FOWLER. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does the Speaker on unanimous-consent day, before the calling of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, recognize Members on the floor ad libitum to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of anything?

The SPEAKER. He does not. After we get through with this motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and call part of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, the Chair might recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], but not now.

The Chair wants to state in regard to this suspension business upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar that we are not going to interrupt the Unanimous Consent Calendar generally unless it is a matter of pressing interest. The Chair has a perfect right to entertain motions all day to-day to suspend the rules, but he is not going to do it.

ADMISSION OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS TO AMERICAN REGISTRY.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "not more than five years old at the time they apply for registry," in section 5 of the act entitled, "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

Under like conditions, in like manner, and to like extent the President of the United States is also hereby authorized to suspend the provisions of the law requiring survey, inspection, and measurement by officers of the United States of foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under this act.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect immediately.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask how much debate was desired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Any reasonable length of time will suit me.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to reserve, Mr. Speaker, the right to object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We shall be content on this side with any reasonable time.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much time will be required.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no extended time desired for debate on this side.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If unanimous consent should be given for the consideration of this bill now—and I suppose the bill would be considered in the House—the gentleman would have the right to move the previous question at any time. Is the gentleman willing to say that he would grant reasonable debate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly; it is my wish to do that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it would be well, if unanimous consent is granted, to agree upon the time for debate and let it be controlled.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think this side of the House would be satisfied with an hour's debate, to be equally divided, if there is any opposition, or to be in the control of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Judging from expressions that I have heard, there may be some desire for time to debate on the bill; how much time I do not know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would 30 minutes on a side be sufficient?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I shall try to find out.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] if he would be willing to couple with his request the La Follette seamen's bill, providing for the safety of men at sea and for the safety of the public at sea—to couple with that a request that it be given a continuing order, so that after the passage of this bill we may have the matter before the House—say, after the Moon bill is considered—and take it up with amendments, and so forth, and pass it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I am as much interested in having the seamen's bill passed as he can possibly be, and I think an arrangement has been made by which it will be passed in the near future. But I do not want at this time to complicate this situation by injecting that measure into the consideration of this bill, and I could not agree to do so under the request for unanimous consent. This is an emergency matter, and should receive the prompt attention of the House, and it ought not to be prejudiced by or connected with any other subject of legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I want to say that, in my judgment, a bill protecting the liberties and the life of the working people on the vessels at sea and also protecting the life of the public is an emergency. No doubt we shall pass this measure that will give the shipowners of the world an opportunity to collect a war rate, and still they want to employ cheap foreign officers and have other privileges that they have had in the past. One of the reasons why they have not been floating under the American flag is that they want to employ those foreign employees for the purpose of operating their ships cheaply. We have neglected to equalize that by not passing the seamen's bill, which should have been passed about one year ago, and still we talk about there being an emergency when other things come up for the profit of the financial pirates of the country that want to take advantage of a very bad condition; and now it is said that the protection of the life and liberty of the working people of the country and the life of the public is not an emergency. Such an argument does not appeal to me by any means, and I want to say that unless there is some understanding that we are going to have an opportunity to pass the seamen's bill in some shape that will give the proper protection to the life and liberty of the seamen and the traveling public, in my judgment, this measure ought to be defeated until such time as gentlemen are ready to consider such a measure to protect the working people of the country and the traveling public, unless it is only the profit of the profit-seeking corporations and of the financial and commercial pirates of the country that appeals to this body here.

The seamen's bill has three purposes: First, freedom of the seaman; second, safety of life at sea; third, to create a condition under which an American mercantile marine may be built up without a subsidy. S. 136—the La Follette seamen's bill—is so framed that these purposes will be accomplished. The accomplishment will come gradually, and it will not administer such a shock as would be likely to seriously upset existing business relations or methods. There would be ample time for readjustment. Under the name of the Wilson bill, it was passed by the House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress by a practically unanimous vote, after having been drafted by the Democratic Committee on Merchant Marine.

It passed the Senate on the 23d of October—that is, in the latter part of the extra session of the present Congress—after having been perfected, and again it received a practically unanimous vote.

Foreign and American shipowners are opposing it, first, through domestic agitation, using for this purpose organizations such as merchants' exchanges, maritime exchanges, boards of trade, and other organizations of big business; second, through shipowners' meetings in European countries, condemning the legislation before the American Congress, and calling upon their own Governments to intervene with their protests through proper diplomatic channels. Shipowners say that the legislation is unnecessary, destructive of discipline, tending from safety, imposing a useless number of boats, an unreasonable number of sailors, and that it will increase the cost of transportation. Those who favor the bill say that it is necessary for the preservation of seamanship, for safety, in the interest of national defense, and to preserve the power of the seas to the white race. They point to the fact, admitted by all, that there is a growing deterioration in the personnel and skill; that boys are shunning and men are leaving the sea, hence the increasing number of disasters, with the great losses of human life. They point to the further fact of a steady, growing employment of orientals at sea, and that this can have but one result, the dominance of the sea by the oriental.

The Alexander substitute would abolish the involuntary servitude of seamen by abolishing their arrest, detention, and surrender back to the vessels from which they had deserted, but it would forfeit the seaman's wages to the ship, and hold him to his vessel by refusing him any percentage of his earned wages in foreign ports or in foreign vessels in ports of the United States. Thus, it would make freedom an illusion, giving promise to the ear but denying fulfillment to the hope. Being destitute, unable to pay for board and lodging, he would be held to his vessel by his economic need or placed back on the vessel under our immigration laws.

The La Follette bill guarantees to the seaman one-half of his earned wages, leaving him to forfeit the other half for violating his contract.

The Alexander substitute, even with its contemplated amendment, provides only one able seaman or licensed deck officer for each boat. To assist in lowering a boat, getting it away from the ship's side, and managing it in a rough sea, it provides two or three "lifeboat men." They may be waiters, stewards, cooks, firemen, oilers, coal passers who have received a certificate as skilled lifeboat men under rules and standards of skill which may be practiced and attained in about a week's time by any landsman, practicing with an empty boat in smooth water. The crew generally is to have a semimonthly training and thus become perfected in the most difficult and most important of all the seaman's work.

The Senate bill provides that each boat shall be provided or shall have in its crew two men of the rating of able seaman or higher. It then provides a weekly drill in port and at sea for all the crew in the handling of boats and other life-saving appliances.

The Alexander substitute provides that on the sea, within 20 miles of land, 35 per cent of boats, 35 per cent of rafts, and 30 per cent of persons on board are to be provided with neither, but they are to be provided with life jackets; and this in spite of the number of people drowned within 2 miles of shore in the St. Lawrence in the disaster that occurred to the Empress of Ireland. On the Lakes it provides 20 per cent of boats, 30 per cent of rafts, and 50 per cent of neither, leaving to those 50 per cent nothing but the life jackets, in all vessels that go 3 miles and more from shore.

The number of persons that may be carried on the Lakes and on the seas within 20 miles from shore is so large under the rules prescribed that it will be a pure matter of discretion with the shipowner. Thus a vessel like the Monroe would, under these new rules, which are to be statutory, be permitted under certain conditions to carry about four times as many people as she was permitted to carry when she was lost—that is, on the sea, within 20 miles of land. On the Lakes she would be permitted to carry ten times as many.

The Senate bill provides seaworthy lifeboats for all persons on board, making the number of people carried dependent upon the ability of the vessel to give to every person at least a promise of an opportunity to escape any disaster in which the vessel would have to be abandoned.

If the House should accept the Alexander substitute, even assuming that the mooted amendments were inserted, the conference committee would be compelled to deal with the question as to whether a seaman should be entitled to one-half of his pay in ports of the United States, with the number of skilled men for each lifeboat, the number of lifeboats and rafts, and the number of people to be carried—that is, freedom, skill, and life-saving appliances would go into conference.

The moment it became apparent that Europe was going into a general war, in which such maritime nations as Russia, Austria, Italy, Germany, France, and England would be involved, an agitation was set on foot here in the United States to so amend the laws governing registration of vessels that the European ship-owning companies, largely owned and controlled by Wall Street capitalists, might place their vessels under the American flag and thus induce the United States to undertake the guarding of such vessels at the risk of getting into difficulties with one or more of the contending powers, more especially with England. The transfer of ships from one nationality to another under such circumstances is always open to the suspicion that the transfer is merely colorable and that the real ownership remains where it was, in which case the vessels are still subject to seizure. This proceeding would involve probable international complications, with the possibility of the United States being drawn into the conflict. The pretended reason put forward by the shipowners is the necessity for vessels to carry our produce to European ports. There is a further proposal made, namely, the suspension of the law which provides that American vessels must be officered by American citizens; that is to say, that the deck officers and engineer officers standing a watch must be citizens of the United States. For 20 or more years American shipowners have hoped for and worked for such amendment of existing law as would permit them to employ as officers on their vessels men who were not citizens.

So they are going to try to get cheap vessels, regardless of whether they be good or bad, cheap officers, and war rates for freight. Before this is consented to the proponents ought to answer satisfactorily, at least, the following questions:

First. Will Great Britain be forced to abandon the sea, or will her merchant vessels continue carrying freight and passengers? France and England being allies, who is to drive the French and English flag off the ocean? Can Germany do it? Can Germany, Italy, and Austria do it jointly? What nation's vessels would we be taking over if not the German?

Second. Would not Great Britain inquire very carefully into the transaction? To what extent would the vessels taken over reduce the freight rates insisted upon by English and French vessels if they were able to keep the sea?

These propositions come from the same interests that so far have successfully resisted such changes in the American laws as would give to the United States an equal chance upon the ocean.

From a national point of view the proposition is questionable. From a business point of view it is profitable—to those engaging in it. To the shipper it promises little relief, if any.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just one word. I have given years to the consideration of the welfare of the seamen, and I am just as much interested in the passage of the seamen's bill as the gentleman from Illinois can be. I want a rational bill, and I think we will have a rational bill. But I insist that we do not want the seamen's bill complicated with this one.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman think the measure he supported in the Sixty-second Congress is a reasonable bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thought so at the time.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will support the gentleman in that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is not such a bill in Congress now.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. There will be if the gentleman's committee does its duty.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is not correct, Mr. Speaker, because the bill was very materially amended in the Senate. If it had passed the Senate in the form in which it was introduced in the House, it might have been a law to-day. No just criticism can be lodged against the Committee on the Merchant Marine for any delay in the consideration and passage of the seamen's bill. The committee has done its whole duty in the premises.

Mr. RUPLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. RUPLEY. May I ask what chance we will have, if this session continues until the 15th of September, to have the seamen's bill brought before the House?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It depends largely on the attitude of the seamen themselves.

Mr. RUPLEY. What have the seamen themselves got to do with the action of a committee of Congress?

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The members of the committee who have given greatest consideration to the seamen's bill have been in conference with Mr. Furuseth, president of the seamen's union, and we hope to come to an agreement about amendments to the House substitute for the seamen's bill that will clear up some provisions in the bill and remove objections thereto and bring it in and pass it if we can get recognition to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. RUPLEY. I have been informed that the seamen themselves——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill just read by the Clerk. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] to act as tellers.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] withdraws his objection. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended, so that there may be 45 minutes on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that instead of having the usual 40 minutes' debate we have 90 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it going to be possible to offer any amendments at all to this measure?

The SPEAKER. It is not. That is one of the things that can not be done.

Mr. BRYAN. There is one little amendment that ought to be agreed to, Mr. Speaker. It should have been read into the bill when it was read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is possible for the gentleman who offers the bill, however, to change the bill at the time he offers it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But he has already offered it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can he not offer to amend it now?

The SPEAKER. He can not. On this motion there will be 90 minutes' debate, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any action taken on the gentleman's motion. He asked unanimous consent, and that was objected to, and then he moved to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but that motion will not be put until the debate is over. Ninety minutes from now the Chair will put that motion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, when I regarded war in Europe as imminent, I introduced the bill (H. R. 18170) to amend section 5 of the Panama Canal act by striking out the limitation which requires foreign-built ships admitted to American registry to be not more than five years old at the time of their admission to registry. Later in the day I received a telegram from the American Exporter, of New York, as follows:

JULY 31, 1914.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of American manufacturers engaged in export trade we earnestly and respectfully suggest that a bill be introduced in Congress for immediate action admitting to American registry any steamships engaged in foreign trade and owned by American individuals, firms, or corporations, no matter when or where such steamships were built. Prompt action must be taken to offset the demoralization of shipping communications not only to Europe but to Latin America and the Far East.

AMERICAN EXPORTER,
17 Battery Place.

Following the receipt of this telegram, I undertook to inform myself more fully about the situation and to ascertain if the emergency was such as would demand immediate action.

The above telegram and information gathered from other sources, including the newspapers, convinced me that something should be done, and promptly, to meet the emergency.

Our foreign commerce was threatened with paralysis. I called a meeting of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for 10.30 o'clock Saturday morning to consider H. R. 18170 introduced by me. A majority of the committee were not present, but those who were present—eight in number—considered the bill which I introduced on Friday and adjourned until Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock, at which time we considered informally the draft of the bill which I have sent to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for H. R. 18170, but no action was taken, as there was not a quorum of the committee present.

On Saturday evening I received the following telegram from Chicago, which further emphasizes the necessity for prompt action to meet the extraordinary situation created by the war in Europe:

CHICAGO, ILL., August 1, 1914.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the foreign trade committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce to-day:

Resolved, That the Chicago Association of Commerce, upon the recommendation of its foreign trade committee, urges upon the Congress of the United States the immediate enactment of such legislation as will most readily procure the registration under the American flag of such vessels as are not now so admitted to registration and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

EDWARD E. GORE,
Acting President.
JOHN J. ARNOLD,
Vice President Foreign Trade Division.

I called another meeting of the committee for this morning at 10.30 o'clock. Ten members of the committee were present. It takes 11 to make a quorum. Of the 10 present all but 1 agreed to the pending bill as an emergency measure; but a quorum not being present, of course, we did not formally report it to the House as a substitute for H. R. 18170. If a quorum had been present, the bill now pending would have been reported to the House as a substitute for the bill which I introduced on Friday.

This bill is simple in its provisions. The first section provides that the words "not more than 5 years old at the time they apply for registry," contained in section 5 of the Panama Canal act, shall be stricken out, so that foreign-built ships, without reference to their age, may be admitted to American registry for the foreign trade. It was thought that under the five-year limitation it would not be possible for American citizens to purchase foreign-built ships to meet the present emergency. Hence the demand that that limitation be removed.

It also was considered that it might not be possible to secure American officers for these ships when brought under the American flag to meet this emergency. Hence the second section of the bill provides:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever, in his discretion, the needs of foreign commerce may require, to suspend, by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

Immediately when this matter was brought to my attention I communicated with Capt. Wescott, who represents the masters and mates of the Pacific, and Mr. Yates, who represents the marine engineers, on the question whether it would be possible to supply American officers for the ships that might be registered under section 1 of the bill.

They gave it to me as their opinion that it could be done; that there were enough masters, mates, and marine engineers out of employment to supply the need, but that it would require some time to get the accurate information. They were both in my office this morning, and they agreed that they would obtain that information; and should this bill become a law in its present form, they would furnish that information to me to convey to the President or convey it direct to the President or to the Secretary of Commerce, under whose department the provisions of the law would be administered.

I assume that it is not the wish of anyone that foreign officers should be employed on American ships unless a real emergency exists. Up to April, 1864, our navigation laws required the officers and seamen on American ships to be American citizens, but in the emergency created by the Civil War that law was repealed. In 1898 the law was reenacted providing that the watch officers on American ships should be American-born citizens or naturalized citizens, and that is the law to-day.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNER. In order to clear up some misapprehension on the part of some Members of the House, let me ask the gentleman if it is not the existing law that Americans who desire to purchase a foreign ship can not put it into the American registry unless it has been five years registered?

Mr. ALEXANDER. A foreign ship may not be admitted to American register unless it is owned by an American citizen or citizens or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of some State, and the managing officers of which are American citizens, and the ship less than five years old.

Mr. TOWNER. That was my understanding; and this provision does not change the requisite for ownership?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at all.

Mr. TOWNER. A man registering a foreign-built vessel under the terms of this bill must purchase it in good faith, must be an American citizen or citizens or corporation which are operating under American law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true. In other words, we are not offering belligerent nations an asylum for their ships, but are giving American citizens an opportunity to purchase ships abroad to carry our commerce, now paralyzed by war in Europe.

Mr. TOWNER. Nor are we offering an opportunity to other nations to operate under the American flag.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at all. We want American citizens who contemplate the purchase of foreign ships to fully understand the responsibility involved. Now I will quote from Glenn's International Law (pp. 238–239):

> It may be said that a neutral has the general right to carry on trade with a belligerent during war, but this general right of trade is subject to the right of the other belligerent to prevent such trade as may be of direct benefit to his enemy in the prosecution of the struggle, and the above rule may be said to be particularly applicable to such property as may be liable to capture at sea, as this is the class of property with the transfer of which fraud is most likely to be connected. The rules of war permit a belligerent to seize the property of his enemy, so that if the transfer of property by a belligerent enemy to a neutral is attended with fraud, the other belligerent is authorized to refuse recognition of it.
> According to the English and American practice, sales of vessels follow the same rule, but according to the rule of France and some other States such sales are forbidden on the ground of fraud, unless made before knowledge of the commencement of war can be imputed to the purchaser.
> In the two countries named the right to transfer vessels is admitted in principle, because of the right of neutrals to carry on trade with belligerents, vessels being considered as legitimate objects of trade. The nature of such a transfer, when made in time of war, is such that a belligerent can with good reason make a most searching examination of all the circumstances connected therewith. The temptation and opportunities for committing fraud in such transfers being very great they are not considered as valid unless the title and interest of the vendor has passed absolutely. In case there is any covenant, condition, or understanding of any kind that the vendor retains an interest in the vessel or profits, or any control over it, or a right of restitution at some future period, or a power of revocation, the transfer would be invalidated.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. With pleasure.

Mr. McKENZIE. Suppose that a vessel is owned by American citizens with a British captain and a Chinese crew. Under this proposed law could the President of the United States suspend the rule and permit that vessel to be registered and continue in the service with the British captain and the Chinese crew in competition with other American vessels that are now handicapped by the laws we have?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If we pass this act, we could.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is there any limit to it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a temporary measure, the provision for watch officers, and I hope the President will have no occasion to invoke the power vested in him under this act to suspend the provisions of section 4131, Revised Statutes, as amended by section 1 of the act of May 28, 1898, because, as I have said, I have started the inquiries which I hope will develop the fact that it will not be necessary to suspend the provisions of existing law in that regard.

The Commissioner of Navigation doubts our ability to meet the need without this emergency provision in the law. I conferred with Mr. Hoover, of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, who informed me that there is a serious question whether the need can be met. As far as some trades are concerned, it might not be important, but not so in other trades.

As I have already stated, up to July 28, 1864, the officers and crews of merchant vessels of the United States were required to be citizens of the United States. The restriction of the crew to American citizens was removed as an urgent war measure by the act of 1864 (13 Stats., 201), and since that time citizens or subjects of any country may act as members of the crew of American merchant vessels. In this respect our law is similar to the British law. American ocean mail steamships, however, under the postal subsidy act of 1891 (Navigation Laws, 1911 edition, top of p. 298) are required to carry a certain percentage of American citizens (at the present time 50 per cent) as members of their crews.

In fact, over half of the men composing the crews of American merchant vessels are now foreigners. The right of foreigners to serve upon neutral vessels unmolested by belligerent powers whose subjects they may be is not now questioned. Indeed, the Eleventh Hague Convention, promulgated by the President on February 23, 1909, makes the following liberal provisions for the protection of crews of merchant vessels of even belligerent States (Treaties and Conventions, Vol. II, p. 2, 348):

> ART. 5. When an enemy merchant ship is captured by a belligerent, such of its crew as are nationals of a neutral state are not made prisoners of war.
> The same rule applies in the case of the captain and officers likewise nationals of a neutral state if they promise formally in writing not to serve on an enemy ship while the war lasts.
> ART. 6. The captain, officers, and members of the crew, when nationals of the enemy state, are not made prisoners of war, on condition that they make a formal promise in writing not to undertake while hostilities last any service connected with the operations of the war.
> ART. 7. The names of the persons retaining their liberty under the conditions laid down in article 5, paragraph 2, and in article 6, are notified by the belligerent captor to the other belligerent. The latter is forbidden knowingly to employ the said persons.
> ART. 8. The provisions of the three preceding articles do not apply to ships taking part in the hostilities.
> ART. 9. The provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention.

All the watch officers of the United States must be citizens of the United States. Section 4131 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of May 28, 1896 (Navigation Laws, p. 54), provides:

> All the watch officers of vessels of the United States who shall have charge of a watch, including pilots, shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.
> The word "officers" shall include the chief engineer and each assistant engineer in charge of a watch on vessels propelled wholly or in part by steam; and after the 1st day of January, 1897, no person shall be qualified to hold a license as a commander or watch officer of a merchant vessel of the United States who is not a native-born citizen or whose naturalization as a citizen shall not have been fully completed.
> [NOTE.—Under British law the citizen or subject of any nation may be an officer of a British merchant ship if he is proved competent, but the laws of nations generally limit officers of their merchant vessels to their own citizens or subjects.]

Section 2 of the pending bill in a guarded manner gives the President the discretionary power to waive the requirement of citizenship. While the need for this departure from a principle we have always followed is to be regretted, it is essential to give any efficacy to the measure.

Our export trade to Europe is almost wholly conducted in foreign steamships. For the past 20 years we have not at any one time had more than eight American steamships continuously employed in trade with Europe. Our mariners have had few opportunities to qualify themselves for the command of trans-Atlantic steamships, and it is not surprising therefore that there are relatively few men qualified by experience to take command as masters or first or second officers—mates—of the large steamers which carry our cotton and wheat to Europe. This situation would be serious at any time. It is doubly serious in a time of pending general European conflict, as at present. You have probably noted in the newspapers that even on the British coasts the lights on the lightships and lighthouses have been extinguished and buoys and other aids to navigation removed. The press reports may not be correct to-day, but these precautions will undoubtedly be taken very soon if the war is general. Under these conditions ships ought to be trusted only with captains and officers familiar by experience with European coasts and ports, and, of course, shipowners will not risk their vessels with others in command.

American investors in ships under foreign flags have for 20 years maintained that, even if allowed by law to take out American registry, they would be reluctant to dismiss faithful and experienced captains and officers and supply their places with new and untried men.

Even in the matter of supplying the extra mates required by the act of March 3, 1913, on certain classes of American coastwise steamers, the Department of Commerce has found difficulty in enforcing the law, partly on account of the scarcity of qualified men at certain times and certain places.

The second section of the bill is carefully guarded. The President is not authorized to suspend the law under any conditions as to the coasting trade. As to the foreign trade he may suspend the law only—

First. Whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require;

Second. In so far as he may deem desirable.

Under this provision he may, for example, suspend the law only as to ships of large tonnage or only as to certain ratings of officers—that is, captains but not third officers, or chief engineers but not first, second, or third assistants—or he may suspend it only in the case of a particular position to be filled on a particular ship. In every case he is to be guided by the pressing needs of our foreign trade on which the country's prosperity is to a great extent dependent, and which must not be embarrassed for lack of a few men competent to conduct ocean transportation under conditions of abnormal difficulty.

Mr. McKENZIE. There is one thing that I want to get clear in my mind. Suppose we enact this bill into law. I want to know whether or not the navigation laws in force now in this country will be binding upon the American who has his ships registered under the American flag. He will have to comply with those laws; and will the ship that comes in now, American owned, manned by foreigners, be permitted to compete with this other man, regardless of our navigation laws, with his foreign crew?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is suggesting a condition that does not exist, because we have only six ships in the North Atlantic trade.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, as I understand this bill, it makes no distinction in this respect about watch officers being American citizens as between vessels now registered under the American flag and vessels that may be purchased and registered under the first section.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly not.

Mr. McKENZIE. The President can suspend them for such time as he may deem necessary.

Mr. MANN. That applies to all vessels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. have 26 ships at the present time. They are preparing for the trade through the Panama Canal from the east to the west coasts of this country. I had a conversation on Saturday morning with the treasurer of that company, and I asked him if it would not be possible for them to withdraw some of their ships and put them into the foreign trade to meet this emergency, and he said they might do so. If they should do that, and they did not have the officers with the necessary knowledge to meet the requirements of the new trade routes, the President could relax the rules, with reference to those ships which are American ships, as well as he could do it with reference to ships which may now be foreign ships and may be purchased by American citizens and registered under our flag.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that under this provision the President has any authority to relax the rule as to a particular vessel, or has he general authority to relax the rule?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is it—just to relax the rule.

Mr. MANN. He can not select particular officers or vessels?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say he could not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Would there be any restriction in the nature of commerce that a ship registered under this proposed law could carry on? What I mean is, could such ships as may be registered under this proposed amendment engage in the coastwise trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They could not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Because the law expressly says that they shall not.

Mr. MANN. The Panama Canal act says that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The law of a hundred years says that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no, the Panama Canal act which admitted them to register provided that they could not engage in coastwise trade.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; they could not be admitted to that trade at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the legal process by which ships engaged in the coastwise trade, such ships as the gentleman referred to as belonging to the Hawaiian Steamship Co., can enter the foreign trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It requires only the disposition to do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do they not have to yield up some nature of registration?

Mr. ALEXANDER. None whatever.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then this Hawaiian company's ships could immediately enter the foreign trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. To-morrow, if they wished to, or any other American ships under the American flag. Is not that correct, I will ask the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the same requirements only are necessary that they have to go through in order to engage in the coastwise trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Has the gentleman information that there are 53 American vessels and 400 licensed officers at the present time idle on the Pacific coast?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have a telegram here to that effect.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. That will be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I will do so now. The telegram is as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 1, 1914.

Capt. W. A. WESCOTT,
National Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Fifty-three vessels laid up; can furnish 250 licensed deck officers at two hours' notice from here; from information received, 100 more from Puget Sound; about 50 from San Pedro.

DUERRBECK.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the licensed officers of the American merchant marine at the present time should not have some opportunity of promotion?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agree with the gentleman that they should.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. And if he does not think they are qualified to navigate ships upon the Atlantic Ocean from American ports to foreign ports?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under ordinary circumstances I should say yes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. What extraordinary circumstances confront us now that differ from other times?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have mentioned the conditions on the coast of England, where it is said all the safeguards of navigation have been removed, the lights in the lighthouses and on the lightships extinguished.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will their pilot service over there be discontinued?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know about that.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Is it not a fact that under ordinary circumstances pilots board those ships and take them into a safe harbor?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the pilots be confined to foreign waters? For instance, will the captains of these ships take the ships across the ocean, or will they simply be confined to foreign ports, to come out and meet the ship and take it in, and bring it out into the open sea? What is the intent of the bill in that respect?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is to provide the necessary officers to navigate the ships when they leave this country.

Mr. FALCONER. From this country to foreign countries?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. And in the discretion of the President they do not have to be Americans.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. Now, I do not wish to detain the House, but the last clause of paragraph 2 simply permits the President to suspend the law with reference to inspection and measurement of ships.

Section 4498 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1905 (Navigation Laws for 1911, p. 114), provides:

> A register, enrollment, or license shall not be granted or other papers be issued by any collector or other chief officer of customs to any vessel subject by law to inspection under this title (Rev. Stats., 4399–4500) until all the provisions of this title applicable to such vessel have been fully complied with and until the certificate of inspection required by this title for such vessel has been filed with said collector.

The Panama Canal act (sec. 5) provides as a condition to registry that foreign-built vessels shall be "certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo." This provision offers a convenient and easily administered rule for the determination of seaworthiness by our inspectors. Practically all foreign steamers and many American steamers are classed or rated in Lloyd's Register. Lloyd's Society and Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping is an association which for 80 years has maintained a body of skilled naval architects and men trained to shipbuilding at maritime ports throughout the world for the purpose of inspecting vessels and determining their seaworthiness according to the society's rules for the guidance of marine insurance companies. This society must be sharply distinguished from a totally different organization or exchange, also known by the name of Lloyds, at whose headquarters it is possible to lay speculative odds on almost any proposition.

The first general regulation of Lloyd's Register for 1914 reads:

Steel vessels built in accordance with the society's rules and regulations, or with alternative arrangements equivalent thereto, will be classed 100A so long as they are found upon careful and periodical survey to be in a fit and efficient condition for the safe conveyance of dry and perishable cargoes.

This classification applies to passenger ships as well as cargo ships. By turning to the current volume of Lloyd's Register, our inspection service can at once secure from the rating 100A prima facie evidence of the seaworthiness of a vessel applying for register. Nearly all the great cargo carriers in trans-Atlantic trade will be found to have this rating. German ships, as a rule, are classed by a corresponding German association, the Germanischer Lloyd, and French ships in a corresponding French association, the Bureau Veritas, the essential rules of which are similar to Lloyd's rule. If in any case, however, the Panama Canal provision should cause delay, the pending bill, second section, second paragraph, gives the President power to waive that requirement, as well as section 4498, Revised Statutes, and permit the American registration of the ship on her foreign certificate of seaworthiness. Probably few occasions requiring the exercise of this power will arise, and then only in the case on a smaller cargo steamer or when inspectors are not immediately available. Our laws already provide for the recognition of foreign certificate of inspection of passenger ships. The act of March 17, 1906, provides:

* * * That when such foreign passenger steamers belong to countries having inspection laws approximately those of the United States, and have unexpired certificates of inspection issued by the proper authorities in the respective countries to which they belong, they shall be subject to no other inspection than necessary to satisfy the local inspectors that the condition of the vessel, her boilers, and life-saving equipments are as stated in the current certificate of inspection. * * *

Section 4148, Revised Statutes, provides (Navigation Laws, p. 22):

Before any vessel shall be registered she shall be measured by a surveyor, if there be one, or by the person he shall appoint, at the port or place where the vessel may be, and if there be none, by such person as the collector of the district within which she may be shall appoint. * * *

The laws of other maritime nations contain similar provisions, and, broadly speaking, the Moorsom system of measuring the tonnage of vessels has been in use through the maritime world for some years. The application of the broad principles of the system is the same everywhere, but in some particulars there are minor differences.

The second section of the bill, second paragraph, enables the President, if necessary, to direct a suspension of section 4148, Revised Statutes, in any given case. If a vessel be loaded with cargo, it is, of course, difficult or impossible to measure her internal contents in cubic feet. If measurement in any case be waived, the foreign measurement certificate, which every foreign ship carries, will be temporarily accepted. This provision of the bill involves no departure from a principle already established by section 2 of the act of August 5, 1882 (Navigation Laws, p. 31):

Whenever it is made to appear to the Secretary of Commerce (and Labor) that the rules concerning the measurement for tonnage of vessels of the United States have been substantially adopted by the Government of any foreign country, he may direct that the vessels of such foreign country be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers, and thereupon it shall not be necessary for such vessels to be measured at any port in the United States; and when it shall be necessary to ascertain the tonnage of any vessel not a vessel of the United States, the said tonnage shall be ascertained in the manner provided by law for the measurement of vessels of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. What limitation is there upon the power of the President to extend this provision as to inspection?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is none in this bill—that is, he may do so when he believes an emergency exists. I will further answer the gentleman's question by calling his attention to section 2 of this bill, which provides:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require, so far and for such length of time to extend by order as he may deem advisable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. MOORE. I assume this is an emergency measure.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. We can not obtain copies of the bill, and therefore we must depend very largely upon the gentleman for information; but I would like to ask the gentleman just what the emergency is, since the passage of this bill, which seems to embody substantive law, makes a very radical change in existing law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman if he was here when I read the telegrams——

Mr. MOORE. I heard part of what the gentleman said, but there was so much confusion I could not hear it all.

Mr. MURDOCK. There was a great deal of confusion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I read telegrams from the American Exporter, of New York, a publication which undertakes to reflect the views of exporters and manufacturers. I also read telegrams from Chicago saying that this legislation is necessary on account of the present congestion of traffic; in other words, to move our manufactures, cotton, and grain to foreign countries. One of the great difficulties in the financial situation grows out of the congestion of our foreign commerce occasioned by the war in Europe and the interruption of the normal course and channels of trade, and it is absolutely necessary to make some provision to move our commerce.

The gentleman knows that 92 per cent of our commerce is carried in foreign ships. Now, the condition of war existing in Europe has partially paralyzed our foreign trade, and unless some provision is made to move our cotton and wheat and other exports in the ships of other neutral nations, or in ships under the American flag, we are going to suffer a very great loss.

Mr. MOORE. Assuming that the condition of war that now prevails in Europe will prevent the use by American exporters of such ships as now sail under foreign flags, and that we will be thrown upon our own resources in the American merchant marine for the carrying of cotton, grain, and so forth, why should we pass a measure of this kind that will change substantive law when only an emergency prevails? Why should there not be some limitation upon the discretion of the President? For instance, he is given discretion here——

Mr. ALEXANDER. He is simply given discretion in reference to officers, foreign officers on the ships, and inspection and the measurement of ships.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman will see that very large questions of shipbuilding and of wages paid to labor are involved here, and will be involved permanently if we adopt this legislation by reason of war conditions in Europe. Why should we pass a permanent law to meet an emergency?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think it will affect these questions materially. In fact, I am not so certain that this bill will in any substantial way build up the American merchant marine, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MOORE. I am glad the gentleman has made that answer because if the effect of the passage of this bill will not be to aid in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine, will we not then be resorting to the subterfuge of using foreign-built ships that will bring us in conflict with nations now at war?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think not, if we act in good faith. It is simply a question now if such an emergency exists to the extent that Americans will buy foreign ships and bring them under the American flag to carry our commerce. There is a large element of patriotism involved in this situation as well as dollars.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know whether there are ships of foreign construction now available and men with American capital ready to buy them to meet this emergency?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Are there?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know of a single man who wants to buy a ship, but the commercial bodies of New York and Chicago, who are vitally interested in moving our commerce, insist that they should have this chance. Now, whether they will avail themselves of it or not I do not know.

Mr. MOORE. In the first paragraph of the gentleman's bill it is proposed to repeal absolutely the five years' limitation in the Panama Canal Act.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. In the second section of the bill it is proposed to give the President of the United States discretion to suspend the order, and so forth, with reference to watch officers. The second paragraph of section 3 also gives the President discretion under like conditions, in like manner, and so forth, with regard to the survey and inspection and measurement of vessels. Does the gentleman insist on the passage of these two paragraphs, giving the President discretion in two separate matters, that will have all the effect of permanent legislation, coming as it does in what is now regarded as an emergency?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I assume the President will never suspend it except in the event of an emergency. If I thought otherwise I would want the limitation myself. If I had drawn the bill, I am frank to say, I would have placed the limitation in it, but I am assuming that the President will administer the law in its spirit, and not permit it to be abused by the use of foreign officers on American ships unless an emergency exists. As I have stated, I have taken steps to ascertain what officers are available.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not wish to consume all the time.

Mr. FALCONER. Have the producers of the country requested the passage of this bill, or who is back of the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The exporters in New York and Chicago are immediately back of it. They are urging legislation along the lines proposed in this bill. For a time the price of wheat was going up—it advanced 7 or 8 cents a bushel—but when it was demonstrated that we could not get ships to move it abroad, the price fell again. And now we want to restore our commerce.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat familiar with the provisions of the existing law which are to be changed by this bill before the House, since I was on the conference committee which considered and reported the law as it stands. The bill changes the existing law in three particulars: First, it removes the five years' limit. The Panama bill provides that no foreign vessel shall be admitted to American registry for foreign trade which is more than five years old. The reason that was then inserted was that we did not believe the American merchant marine should or could be upbuilded by a lot of old worthless ships placed in American foreign commerce for the sake of having the number of ships increased upon our foreign register. Secondly, this bill changes the existing law by granting to the President the authority to allow foreigners to act as watch officers instead of requiring Americans, including naturalized citizens, as has been the law for 50 years; and, thirdly, it gives the President the authority to suspend the law as to inspection, survey, and measurement of ships, by this means not requiring a certain standard of efficiency, thus practically allowing the President in an emergency to admit almost any sort of ships, with any sort of officers and men. Now, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] that an emergency does exist, and I also agree with him that I do not think this measure will greatly help it. But that some help is necessary, I can inform the House of some information which has come to me within the last hour. I was called to the telephone and informed by a representative of some of the largest exporting flour concerns of our section of the country that three cargoes of American flour were now in one of the ports of a nation now in state of war, billed, for its final destination, to a neutral port in one of the smaller countries which is not likely to be engaged, and that that flour was held there; that no ships could be had and so it could not be forwarded. There were no neutral ships available, and they wanted some assurance by our Government in order that the flour might be protected until neutral ships can be obtained that it may be forwarded as it was ordered. All agree such a step is necessary, and ought to be done. No one can question that. No one can doubt that at the present time there are no American ships with which to do that work. So our merchants and exporters must depend upon the chance of securing a suitable vessel under a neutral flag. So we realize that a real emergency does exist which involves vitally the welfare of our own people. Our grain, our flour, our cotton, and lumber, and like exports, must be sent abroad to be sold or prices at home will drop tremendously and the whole business of this country will be demoralized. This will mean ruin to large sections of our country.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Substantiating what the gentleman has said I wish to say that the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad and the Rock Island Railroad have refused to receive shipments of wheat destined for Galveston in view of the congested condition of that port. They can not get the wheat out of the country

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am glad of the statement of my friend from Colorado. It is because a great portion of the country needs and wants and must have its crops marketed. I shall vote for this bill, yet I do it with reluctance. That reluctance extends to every one of its three positive provisions, that it permits foreign officers to man American vessels, and that it lowers the standard and safety of vessels under our flag in the foreign trade. It has been the policy of our country—and it ought to be—and we never can build up an American merchant marine under any other policy than that American citizens should be put on the vessels and perform the service of officers for the American merchant marine. We know that a foreigner can be naturalized, and a great many of the best of the officers are naturalized, and they become good American citizens. But for the present I presume we shall be obliged to dispense with that qualification, much to my regret. Also, the standard of inspection is here reduced, which should not be done. Under that it will be allowable that a lot of old worthless vessels which are now in the English, German, and French merchant marine can be given American register for the sake of carrying our commerce. That is not creditable to us, but it seems to now be necessary. But the thing I most am afraid of is that this will be used as a method of violating the laws of neutrality and involve the United States in international difficulty at this critical time. I will state why I am of this opinion: While the Panama bill was under discussion one of the great German lines was here, through its representatives, in a perfectly proper way—I think it was the Hamburg Line—and conferred with some of the conferees. And I think they conferred with the gentleman from Missouri, Judge ALEXANDER. They desired that this act should be used to place quite a large number of vessels then under the foreign flag under the American flag to engage in the foreign trade and in the Panama trade, but that the stock should be owned and controlled, as much as required or allowable under our laws, by the great German corporation, but that the concern and business should be American; that while the management should be American, as the law requires, the real management of it should be under the control of the great foreign corporation.

Now, exactly that can be done under this bill, and I am afraid will exist under it. If this be done, it will encourage some of the subsidiary lines of the great foreign companies to dispose of their ships and the new concern taking them involve us in international disputes. The question of good faith would be raised at once. This bill allows these countries and these great companies to avoid terrible losses, to place their old vessels under our flag and transfer them and use their officers and crews now manning them and involve us in difficulty with contending parties. This bill may be the means of sending to market a good shipload of many products, but it can not be a method of building up the American merchant marine. But it may be the means in this terrible catastrophe of awakening the American people to the necessity of strengthening their position in the carrying trade of the world. Our farmers and exporters and the people of the Central States may now realize its importance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It can not be done by a petty, temporary makeshift, but by a broad, liberal, generous policy which can extend for a long term into the future. Petty discrimination proposed in the Underwood tariff bill will accomplish nothing, and far different methods must be considered for our freight than for our passenger and mail steamers. We realize that it costs more to construct our ships here than abroad. If we can encourage our shipyards to build better and cheaper, that will help some; for that reason the policy lately adopted for political purposes of building many of our naval vessels in navy yards should be reversed. Only enough should be constructed there to prevent extortion of the Government. The rest should be constructed in private yards.

That would be some help toward the cheaper construction of our ships and providing suitable private yards for all emergencies in our own country. It costs more in this country to maintain and operate our ships. So far as we can fairly do so, we should insist on similar conditions as to crew space, food, and so forth, in our competitors as in our own vessels. That will help some. We want and insist on our seamen being treated as human beings. If this costs more, then we must fairly pay for it and know what we are about. We need mail and passenger ships under our own flag to secure our own business. Unless we do have it, we must expect discrimination against us by our rivals, which will place our commerce at a great disadvantage, if not cripple us. This should be met by adequate lines of our own to all parts of the world. This means mail subsidies, if one cares to apply that most obnoxious and hostile term to them. But is not it a public duty to have this service? Is not it now a necessity, call it maintenance by any term you please? The people will now be awakened when they will realize and not be misled by epithets. We profit annually several million dollars by mail pay on postal sea business. It should be expended then, with enough more, to supply vessels for emergencies such as we had a few months ago in the Mexican crisis or as we have now in selling and sending our goods. The people may listen now to some sensible, sound, and sane plan for the reconstruction of an American merchant marine.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, this is another extraordinary presentation of a bill. We are asked to-day, because of emergency existing, to pass a bill through the Congress of the United States before it has been printed.

The great foreign war that is now stirring all Europe places a premium on the Stars and Stripes on the high seas.

We are asked in this bill to amend our maritime laws to the extent of permitting foreign officers to man our ships, or, at least, to permit foreign ships, irrespective of age, to be purchased by the citizens of the United States.

It develops in the discussion, however, that the bill provides that while these ships are to be officered by Americans and the organization controlling them is to be American the real owners or holders in the company may be foreigners, and, further, that foreign pilots may be employed.

The statement is made that it is necessary to have pilots familiar with foreign ports, because the buoys and lights on foreign coasts are to be removed, and it would be necessary to have officers familiar with foreign ports, in order that the American ships may enter without danger of injury.

It has occurred to me as I have heard the brief discussion here to-day that the passage of this bill places much power in the hands of the President of the United States. It is urged that we can consistently make an effort and again place our merchant marine on the high seas.

In reply to an inquiry the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] states that the men who are back of the movement to enlarge our shipping facilities are the producers of the country.

We are told by the gentlemen that the railroads over the country are refusing consignments of grain for seaport cities, shipping points, on the ground that there is a lack of storage facilities to store grain in the absence of sufficient ships to remove the grain as fast as it reaches the shipping points.

There is no question but that the producers of the country desire to remove their products, but I am very certain, sir, that the producers do not wish to lower the standards of seamen, nor do they wish to profit at the expense of American standards of accommodations of American seamen, nor to bring conditions to the lower standards of foreign shipping.

It is to be regretted that the La Follette seamen's bill has not been reported out of the committee and presented to the House for consideration before this "emergency matter" has come up. It would have been an excellent time to have impressed upon the maritime powers of the world the par excellence conditions of American seamen over the lower standards of foreign shipping laws as regards protection to seamen.

The administration should have urged the consideration of the seamen's bill before this time.

We, as legislators, can very readily grasp the necessity for relief to the farmer and other producers of the country by arranging more means whereby more ships may be employed in our foreign trade. Ninety-two per cent of American commerce has been carried by foreign ships. That, Mr. Speaker, is an astounding condition of affairs and emphasize the fact that we have rapidly declined in the matter of merchant marine.

It is very evident that we must needs find a means of getting cotton, wheat, and other crops to foreign markets, and this necessity is the only reason that I can see for such a measure as this, and yet a very substantial reason why the bill should pass the House.

It gives much power to the President of the United States, but in a day like this, when conditions abroad produce emergencies, we willingly vote the President power, believing that he has full appreciation of the fact that the American producers, including farmers and manufacturers, are not willing to sacrifice American standards to the maritime slave conditions of some foreign countries.

We fully appreciate that belligerents can not operate shipping without the loss of ships and cargoes. The United States being neutral has an advantage.

The closest consideration should be given to the proposition of keeping the American flag free from all foreign entanglements that might involve us in a controversy with any party to the contest now taking place in Europe. There is just a shade of danger that we may become involved in taking even foodstuffs and wearing apparel into England, Germany, or France, but the exigency of moving our products is before us.

One might suggest that if our coastwise ships should engage in foreign shipping we would feel the effect in interstate transportation.

The responsibility of holding aloof from foreign complications and of preserving the standards of American shipping is before the administration. We give it the power by supporting this bill, and we support the measure in an emergency at the solicitation of the administration.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think there are no Members on the floor of this House who would be ready to vote for this bill if in any sense it was to be considered as the determined attitude of the American people with regard to the things to which it refers. It is, as everyone understands, an emergency measure. You have heard the statement made by the chairman of the committee that over 90 per cent of all the foreign commerce of the United States is carried in foreign bottoms.

I think it is true that more than 75 per cent of all of that commerce is carried by the three great maritime nations—England, Germany, and France—which will soon probably be belligerants in this conflict. We have in this country now ready for export the greatest crops that this country has ever offered to the markets of the world. Millions of bales of cotton, hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat and of corn and of other grains, are being offered and are in the market. We can not send them to the foreign market. Already we hear through the press that cotton has gone down $4 a bale upon the news that it can not be exported. This will be the case with all the products of America unless we can provide, and provide now and at once in this emergency, to meet it.

It may be that the reservations that have been made by gentlemen who have spoken are justified, but I am willing to relax the rules that American vessels should be officered by American citizens for the time being.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. The question is, If the three great maritime nations are involved in war, will not cotton and wheat and corn be contraband of war, and in that case how can they get them to market?

Mr. TOWNER. They are not contraband.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will they not be if they are destined to those ports?

Mr. TOWNER. That class of products is not inherently contraband of war and will not be made so unless by declaration of the belligerent powers themselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, let me go further and say that these other questions that gentlemen refer to about selling old and abandoned vessels to American citizens are not questions that are concerning us now. I judge that Americans who are to purchase vessels will not purchase that kind of vessels. They will not be compelled to. They will exercise their judgment in the purchase of vessels and will take only such vessels as they think will justify the investment of American capital; and when it comes to American seamen and American officers officering these vessels, those things can be taken care of later.

This is but giving the President the temporary power to act in this emergency. It seems to me that there can be no possible question of the wisdom of this act. If it shall be found that we have a President who is not patriotic enough—which I do not believe—to protect the interests of American citizens and the American people, then this Congress can act at any time it desires and repeal this law which we are now about to place upon the statute books. It is within our power to protect ourselves, and if we shall not now act in this emergency as any other nation would act, we shall certainly be derelict in our duty to the best interests of the people of this country.

I hope that this act will pass by an overwhelming majority. I hope that there will be no man here on either side of the House at this time that will regard this as anything else than what it professes to be—a temporary act to meet a great emergency, in which we can subserve the interests of American citizens by doing what we are asked to do without any danger to the permanent interest of American commerce or American citizenship. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 10 minutes on each side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time may be extended 10 minutes on each side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I appreciate the gravity of the situation as much as any man who has spoken, and yet I do not think it is of such pressing importance to pass this bill to-day that we should pass it without further consideration. I shall vote against the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] introduced a bill on Saturday. He has introduced a bill to-day, this morning, with radically different provisions from those of the bill he introduced on Saturday, and I should have much more confidence in the bill if it had the indorsement of his mature judgment, because I highly appreciate the judgment of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri and the care and study which he has given to these matters.

Now, I am afraid that this legislation will lead us into difficulties. It is evidently almost a subterfuge. We are extending our laws in regard to these vessels, bringing them in under our registration, to be run by foreign seamen—that is, seamen of the countries that run them now. It is a mere temporary change of ownership for a purpose—the purpose of admitting them to American registry and of sailing them under the American flag.

Suppose the countries under which these ships are sailing now do not take kindly to this kind of legislation. Suppose some country seizes some of these ships, claiming that they are ships under the flag of their enemies and not under the flag of a neutral country like the United States, although they are waving the American flag. Are we to have a repetition of that little misunderstanding that we had awhile ago with Huerta and undertake to compel them to apologize for seizing these vessels?

We can not be too scrupulous at this time. We can not be too scrupulous about our relations with these belligerents across the water. Here is a great war, involving all Europe, involving all the great foreign nations of the earth. We want to remain neutral. We want to keep out of it. We want no entanglements with it. I think we ought to consider these matters more thoroughly before we make such a radical departure.

The bill to-day has all the earmarks of a subterfuge to get these vessels under the American flag for the protection of the American flag, because we waive all the present prohibitions of law about a large proportion of the crews being American citizens and we waive all the conditions about a survey. We are admitting all vessels, no matter what their age may be, and then the President can modify the law so that there shall be no survey of these old hulks that we may get in under the American flag.

This bill has not attained perfection nor anything near it yet. It ought to be considered carefully by the committee of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is the capable chairman, and when brought in here it ought to be considered for at least a day, so that all these questions, which naturally present themselves to the mind of any man who has any information on the subject, may be carefully examined; and it ought not to be rushed through the House and an immature bill be passed. I hope that the House will go slowly in these matters. While we want to protect our own people and our own markets, and to protect the people who purchase grain and manufactures to ship them abroad, still we do not want to do it in any such manner as possibly to involve our country in war on either side of this great conflict that is taking place. Therefore I shall vote against this motion, and against passing the bill in this form, hoping that after more mature deliberation the gentleman will bring in a bill which can be considered by the House, perhaps by unanimous consent; or if not that, then under the authority of the Committee on Rules. In that way it can be done in ample time to meet this emergency, when we know what we want and what we want to do, so that we can safely act in this direction.

They say this is temporary. Why, if these vessels get under the American flag, they will stay there as long as the owners desire to have them stay there; and if these restrictions are removed, they will stay there as long as the restrictions are suspended in regard to sailing them under the American flag with foreign crews. We ought to go slowly, Mr. Speaker. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in asking that the House take sufficient time to carefully consider this emergency measure, has said very largely what I had in mind to say. An emergency exists, but, in my opinion, not one so immediate as to sweep us off our feet.

How unfortunate it is that it takes so great a situation as all Europe at war to force us to a knowledge of what a headless, heedless, worthless, down-and-out, landlubber marine policy we have. A little less than 100 years ago we bid fair to be supreme on the seas. Now we are face to face with what everyone who has looked into it has known for years past—we have no merchant marine. Our shipping policy has been controlled from the interior, and it is now the interior that seems likely to suffer first.

There is one reason which warrants the passage of this emergency measure, and that is this: Our American shipping policy is so bad that we can not possibly make it any worse. Perhaps the efforts to solve a situation which finds us with no ships in which to carry abroad wheat, corn, or cotton, or any other commodity, will make us decide, not as an emergency, but seriously, to put the American flag back on the sea to stay there.

It is not at all likely that this emergency measure will do much good. We are too late.

It is said that Congress must now prolong its session. Why not do something for a real, permanent merchant marine? We have the South American trade to look after. If Europe goes into involved war, we may expect a great increase in trade with the South American Republics, provided we can produce the necessary ships.

In the last few months we have seen a great consolidation of the subsidized shipping of Japan for business through the Panama Canal, and almost every problem that comes up now will naturally run to the Panama Canal problem.

What ships have we? The Government records show that the total number of owners of registered American vessels is 1,076; owners of single vessels number 721, while persons owning two or more ships number 355. This latter class owns 1,187 vessels registered in the different States and of gross tons as follows:

Maine, 191; tonnage, 157,720. Massachusetts, 271; tonnage, 208,524. Rhode Island, 6; tonnage, 2,344. Connecticut, 93; tonnage, 104,107. New York, 476; tonnage, 1,067,448. New Jersey, 80; tonnage 67,136. Pennsylvania, 155; tonnage, 168,591. Delaware, 37; tonnage, 27,535; Maryland, 106; tonnage, 121,371. District of Columbia, 3; tonnage, 5,671. Virginia, 2; tonnage, 252. Georgia, 4; tonnage, 556. Alabama, 7; tonnage, 3,909. Florida, 6; tonnage, 5,322. Mississippi, 2; tonnage, 653. Texas, 14, tonnage, 30,881. Minnesota, 8; tonnage, 13,549. California, 315; tonnage, 409,761. Arizona, 2; tonnage, 990; Oregon, 17; tonnage, 12,387. Washington, 67; tonnage, 7,988. Alaska, 3; tonnage, 482. The Hawaiian Islands, 22; tonnage, 14,194. The net tonnage is approximately two-thirds of the gross.

The total number of vessels registered in principal cities is shown as follows: New York, 550; San Francisco, 403; Boston, 204; Philadelphia, 185; Baltimore, 110; Portland, Me., 46; Bangor, 34; Bath, Me., 37; Rockland, Me., 26; New Bedford, 32; Fall River, 33; Gloucester, 59; New Haven, 37; New London, 36; Perth Amboy, 59; Wilmington, Del., 31; Port Townsend, Wash., 39, making 1,921 out of the whole number of 2,608 in 17 cities.

Mr. TOWNER. The list that the gentleman has read includes the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, does it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. I think it includes all.

But, as a matter of fact, the records show the total number of vessels registered in the Bureau of Navigation is 2,608, with a total net tonnage of 2,239,992. This number includes all seagoing craft, whether engaged in coastwise or foreign trade or traffic on inland waters, and includes those of from 10 tons net up.

There are but three American vessels of more than 8,000 tons. The largest is 13,328 tons, which is the Minnesota, owned by the Great Northern, and running from Puget Sound to the Orient. The other two larger than 8,000 tons are the Mongolia and Manchuria, each of 8,750 tons, and owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.

Of 17 other ships of more than 5,000 tons, 2 are owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., a Government corporation; 2 by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.; 4 by the International Mercantile Marine Steamship Co.; 8 by the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co.; and 1 by the Matson Navigation Co., of San Francisco.

While we are taking up—picking up—old foreign ships for use under the American flag we should consider the matter of insurance. If we pass such legislation that foreign vessels can come under American registry, I do not think that the insurance will drop to any such figure that the people of the United States will feel warranted in sending great cargoes into the ports of war-ravaged countries.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to insert an article on this subject from the New York Sun of this date, as follows:

OPINION IS UNANIMOUS.

The councils of the nations have heretofore foreseen just such a situtation as now exists, where one nation seeks profit for itself and transportation for its goods by inviting vessels of belligerent countries to shift to a neutral flag and thus escape the ordinary consequences of war.

Consequently the most stringent provisions have been made in international agreements for meeting this situation. These provisions all tend to make such emergency transfers well-nigh impossible by declaring them to be of a character which the belligerents need not recognize as valid and permitting the belligerents to treat vessels thus hastily transferred from a hostile to a neutral flag as the enemy's vessels.

The form of American law has little to do with the situation, according to international lawyers, as the proposed transactions must be measured by their international standing. Consequently they assert that a modification of the United States law regarding registry of American vessels will not in the least relieve the present situation, though it may have helpful effects after the hostilities are ended.

The United States thus faces the prospect of being unable to get anything like an adequate number of ships in which American crops and American manufactures may be carried into the world's markets. The situation constitutes one of the biggest problems now confronting the United States and is a forceful demonstration of the utter dependence of the United States upon foreign shipping.

The prohibitions against the plan are contained first in the general acceptance by all nations that no transfer of an enemy ship to a neutral flag is valid unless there is an actual sale.

That is, the control of and profits from the ships must be passed into new hands to make such a transfer recognizable by belligerents.

The theory of this established principle of international law is that ships must not be permitted by subterfuge to escape the consequences of their country being at war. The United States Government is on record in specific instances as confirming this principle and insisting upon its being adhered to.

DECLARATION OF LONDON.

This principle was elaborated and its workings made more specific and drastic by the provisions of what is known as the declaration of London. This declaration is a set of rules for maritime warfare, which were drawn up at a conference in which all the maritime powers were represented at London from December 4, 1908, to February 26, 1909.

Its provisions were signed by all the delegates present, including the Americans, and the convention was consented to by the United States. Thus it is binding upon the United States. All the Governments likewise consented to the convention with the exception of Great Britain, and as a result of British objections formal notifications of the convention have never been exchanged.

The declaration is regarded, however, as the expression of the world's thought on the questions therein disposed of, and there is not the slightest doubt, according to the authorities in Washington, that in the present conflict it will be the guide for the action of all the powers.

Each power, it is said, will insist that its provisions be lived up to, and it is asserted here that on the day of final reckoning disputes arising out of the war will be decided in accordance with the provisions of this agreement.

Article 55 provides:

"The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected before the outbreak of hostilities is valid unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed. There is, however, a presumption, if the bill of sale is not on board a vessel which has lost her belligerent nationality less than 60 days before the outbreak of hostilities, that the transfer is void. This presumption may be rebutted."

The article further provides:

"Where the transfer is effected more than 30 days before the outbreak of hostilities there is an absolute presumption that it is valid if it is unconditional, complete, and in conformity with the laws of the countries concerned, and if its effect is such that neither the control of nor the profits earned by the vessel remain in the same hands as before the transfer. If, however, the vessel lost her belligerent nationality less than 60 days before the outbreak of hostilities and if the bill of same is not on board the capture of the vessel gives no right to demand damages."

TRANSFER AFTER OUTBREAK.

Regarding the transfer of vessels of a belligerent country after the outbreak of hostilities, the rule is simple. Such transfers are void and need not be recognized by any of the belligerents if it can not be proved that the transfer was not made to evade the consequences of the war.

There is not, of course, any pretense that the present plan is for any other purpose in the world except to avoid the consequences of the war.

Article 56, containing this rule, is as follows:

"The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void, unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel is exposed, provided that there is an absolute presumption that the transfer is void—

"If the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockade port.

"If a right to repurchase the vessel is reserved to the vendor.

"If the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled."

NO ESCAPE SEEN.

These provisions are so clear and positive that there is likely to be no escape whatever from them, in the opinion of international lawyers and certain experienced men here.

Furthermore, it will not be possible even for the United States to get American-owned vessels which fly foreign flags—as practically all of them do—under American registry at this late date and secure for them exemption from the consequences of war.

Article 57 of the declaration of London provides that "the neutral or enemy character of a vessel is determined by the flag which she is entitled to fly."

In other words, American-owned ships flying foreign flags are subject to the same conditions of transfer as vessels flying the same flag but not owned by Americans. The American ownership gives no relief.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minues to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the great question of the War of 1812 was the problem of free ships and free trade, the question of the United States Government having a right to sail its ships with full and untrammeled authority on those ships in all the ports of the world. In the final settlement that we got out of that war we did not get the rights and privileges that we thought we were entitled to when we began the War of 1812. The treaty of Ghent was a compromise.

Now, the question comes up again as to whether we have the right not only to accept foreign sailors and naturalize them, and meet the whole world and prevent them from impressing those sailors into their service, but whether we have the further right to register foreign ships under our flag, to send them forth under the protection of this country, supported by the naval power of this country. If this bill is passed, that complicated question comes up. I am willing to meet that under the circumstances and the emergency that exists. I am willing to agree to the proposition that a foreign-built ship that is older than five years may come under American registry. I do not care how old a ship is that comes under American registery, if it is a good ship, if it is able to go over the sea with safety to passengers, and if it is worthy of American registry. But it is here proposed to pass a permanent law providing that hereafter, for all time to come, or until this act is repealed, we shall not only recognize the principle of foreign officers and foreign crews on our ships, but give to the President of the United States the right, without the consent of Congress, whenever he deems it right and proper, to waive the rules and regulations requiring the watch officers to be either native-born or naturalized American citizens.

I do not believe we ought for one moment to permit foreign officers to take charge of vessels in the American merchant marine. I do not think we ought to pass an amendment providing for that at any time. But they say that this is an emergency, that the existing conditions require it, and that under the circumstances we should support it, and that it will be unpatriotic if we do not support it. Very well. I suggested to the gentleman in charge of this bill that he put into it an amendment providing that the privilege or authority given to the President of the United States to suspend the laws with reference to American citizens on these vessels should expire in one or two years, so that it would not be permanent law, and in that event I think I could see my way to yield my own judgment to the argument of emergency. But that could not be agreed to. We can not in connection with this bill have an amendment that provides that at the end of two years the President shall cease to have the authority to waive the law which requires that the officers on these ships shall be Americans.

Under present law we permit Chinese crews. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] was asking about Chinese crews. We can have nearly any kind of a crew that a dollar-seeking shipowner wants, but the watch officers are required to be American-born citizens or naturalized citizens. Now it is proposed to permit the President to waive that requirement whenever a delegation comes to him and convinces him that it is right, appropriate, and proper to waive it. I do not believe that Congress ought to waive it, and far from permitting the President to waive it. If it was only for two years, it would be a different thing, but after the present administration is gone and passed out and another new one has come in, and others come and go, that will still stay on the statute books until all the provisions established in this House for getting legislation through the House and before the Senate and through the Senate are complied with and the bill we are enacting is repealed.

I do not believe we ought to go that far. It is true the other provision is full of possibilities of conflict and trouble. The London convention of 1910, as I heard it read this morning, provides that the transfer of registry of a belligerent ship to a neutral ship within 60 days before war has been declared or during war is presumptive evidence or prima facie evidence of fraud, and so it is a dangerous and perilous mission we are engaging in.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, for a great many years we on this side of the House have realized the importance of building up the American merchant marine, and at various times bills have been offered intended to accomplish that laudable and useful and patriotic purpose. We have foreseen just such conditions as these that have now arisen. We have realized year after year the loss of opportunity on the part of our workmen, on the part of our steel and lumber interests, and in the building of ships. We have realized the great loss to the American public in the payment of sums of money to foreign shipowners, and we have realized that the time might come when all Europe would be in arms and might deprive us of our facilities for transporting our vast surplus of foodstuffs and manufactured articles.

We are now face to face with such a situation, and it is an emergency. It is said that something ought to be done. I am inclined to think that is true. I scarcely feel like taking the responsibility of saying, so far as my vote goes, that we shall not do what is suggested, and yet I doubt very much indeed whether it will have any considerable helpful effect. In the first place, I doubt if there is sailing under any foreign flag any new first-class ships that will take advantage of this opportunity. We may bring temporarily under our flag a lot of old hulks now sailing under flags of various belligerent nations; they will carry the American flag; but that will be the only thing about them that we will have reason to be proud of. They may help somewhat in carrying our goods should general war come, as seems likely, but that is doubtful, and there is a danger that the moment one of these ships sets forth from our ports with an American cargo she will be captured and libeled by one of the belligerents. I doubt if under the laws of war relating to merchant ships, as they exist and are interpreted, the owners of a ship now belonging to a citizen of a belligerent power may properly and in good faith take advantage of the opportunity that we propose to offer.

It seems to me that the transfer we encourage would be considered a subterfuge. It would not be intended to be permanent. They would come under our flag simply to escape the fear or danger of capture under their own flag. They would retain their foreign officers and their crews. They would retain all these conditions of employment and with regard to space for crew and passengers which are abhorrent to us and which we have not heretofore tolerated.

The moment they were compelled to comply with the conditions as to the personnel and officers and as regards space and conditions that we have believed to be essential in ships carrying the American flag they would probably surrender their American register and go back under the flag under which they are now sailing. I doubt if the code of morals of the maritime world or the laws of war would justify any of the exchanges of flags contemplated or hoped for under this bill. I should rather expect, if it was attempted to any considerable extent, the result would be that the vessel so changing her citizenship would be likely to be captured and libeled, and we would fail in our efforts to give relief to the American merchant marine and get ourselves into complications with foreign nations.

Still there is a condition that needs remedying, and if we can remedy or in any wise relieve the situation which we have brought upon ourselves by refusing to pass legislation to build up the American merchant marine I shall not stand in the way. Therefore I shall vote for the bill in the hope that it may to some extent at least aid in affording means for the transportation of American exports, and that it will not either permanently establish a bad precedent as to crews and conditions on American ships or get us into foreign complications without materially helping our trade.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri for answering a few questions when, a little while ago, I robbed him of some of his time, but there was one question I desired to ask him which I was not able to propound, and that was as to the authorship of the bill.

I did not want to press the gentleman as to whether the bill came from the White House or from the Secretary of the Treasury or whether it came from any outside source, but I did want to know whether it originated in the committee. An answer to that question would have been important, because the bill comes into the House without being printed and we had no opportunity to study the effect of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire to have his question answered?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that on last Friday the President of the United States requested me to investigate this situation and report the facts to him in a bill. Judge ALEXANDER and myself conferred with Mr. Chamberlain, the head of the Navigation Bureau of the Commerce Department, and this bill was prepared by Mr. Chamberlain in accordance with the suggestions that Judge ALEXANDER and myself made to him. Subsequently, after it was prepared, it was submitted to the President as it now stands and was drawn and met with his entire approval, and he authorized me to say that he desires its passage.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much for that statement and would ask him this further question, whether his view of this bill is that it is an emergency bill, pure and simple?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely, so intended.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman. That answers the question which to my mind is of great importance in this matter. We have come into the House this morning, each one of us with knowledge through the newspapers that a great international foreign war is impending, and everyone with a desire to keep as far aloof from that war, so far as American interests are concerned, as is possible. Two measures of very great importance have been brought in on stress of the news of which each one of us is possessed. The first was an emergency measure with reference to the extension of the currency system, as provided for in a previous Congress for the relief of the people of the United States and for their protection. That was passed by the almost unanimous vote of the House. Under the same cover of an emergency comes this bill, which proposes to amend several of the navigation laws of the country—laws that were intended for the protection of American shipping, to safeguard the interests of those who build ships and of those who sail the ships, as well as to protect the interests of those who do shipping business in the United States. Gentlemen have spoken of the great preponderance of business that is carried in foreign bottoms. That is true. The American merchant marine is not what we would like it to be, but the great American market is so vastly superior to the foreign business carried in foreign bottoms that we have reason to consider protecting what we have in that American market.

The main business that comes to and goes from our shores in foreign bottoms, vast as it is, is insignificant compared with the business of the United States. I assume, also, that we want to protect that business of the United States against any international trouble. Therefore, if we are about to revise our navigation laws by a measure that is intended to cover only on emergency, but which will, as some of us believe, prove to be permanent law, then we have to consider whether by the enactment of that legislation, be it emergency or permanent law, we shall involve ourselves with foreign nations. It is proposed that we proceed to buy up foreign ships; to put on them foreign seamen; to give the President of the United States discretion with regard to survey and measurement. And for what purpose? To enable some of our exporters to carry out the orders they have with foreign countries, orders concerning which they have notice now that there is very great risk. I say, there is a question whether in the enactment of this law we are so safeguarding ourselves that immediately we secure these foreign-built ships, these foreign-manned ships, these foreign-measured ships, and they pass beyond the 3-mile limit with American cargoes for belligerents, they are not subject to seizure and will not involve us in international complications.

I do not want to stay any patriotic move made by gentlemen on the other side. I trust, however, this is only an emergency measure. I want to see the welfare of this country advanced and its interests protected upon land and sea, but we should be careful to avoid entangling this Nation in this foreign turmoil.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the American manufacturers, the American farmers, mechanics, artisans, financiers—all—are looking to the Congress of the United States to-day to do something which will enable them to meet the emergency which is upon us. We have the greatest crop the country has ever known. We can not use all of the cereals that we have raised. We want to ship them abroad. The world needs them. We have not the vessels with which to make these shipments. The enactment of this law will furnish these vessels, if men in this country are willing to invest their money in the ships needed for American registry. We are not buying ships; we are not passing any law that obligates the Government of the United States to buy ships. We are simply affording the American people an opportunity to invest their money in an enterprise that will maintain the prosperity of America and its people.

I am going to vote for the bill. I do it with some misgivings, however, because of the fear that we may find ourselves in complications with the nations abroad, but if the enactment of this law or any other law will give greater assurance of continued American prosperity than could exist without the enactment of the law, then, I say, without fear of successful contradiction, we have only performed our duty when we vote for it, and if we fail to pass the law that will give assurance of continued American prosperity, we have failed in the performance of our duties, as men who sit here and speak for the American people.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose we buy one of these foreign ships, put the American flag upon it, load it with a cargo of grain for belligerents in France, and it is seized by the German Navy, what then?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, that is a contingency we will have to meet when we reach it.

Mr. MOORE. Will not we have to defend that ship and defend that flag?

Mr. MADDEN. The flag of the United States will be defended in every land and on every sea by all the power of the American Government. [Applause.] And I take it that when we fly the American flag on a ship carrying goods made by the American people we are going to protect that ship and that flag, no matter where the ship may be.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman spoke——

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield to anybody now.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman spoke of peace this morning——

Mr. MADDEN. And I am for peace always, never for war; but I am for peace with honor and only for war when the honor of the Nation is involved, but I am for the prosperity of the American people, and if from prosperity war comes, I am for war. I am first an American, then a Republican. [Applause.] I am for the flag wherever it may be, and if we can register ships made abroad and fly the American flag on those ships for the transportation of American products I am for the registration of those ships to carry our goods to the end of the world under any and every circumstance. [Applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. How much time has the gentleman yielded back?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One minute.

Mr. MANN. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the enactment of this law is asked for by American shippers. I am fearful that it is one that will embroil us with European belligerents. King Solomon was a very wise old King, and he said in one of his proverbs:

> He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears.

It may not be hard to take hold of the dog by the ears, but it may be hard and dangerous to let go. This proverb may with propriety be applied to nations as well as to individuals. I do not think it will do the American people and Members of Congress any harm once in a while to read Washington's Farewell Address and become conversant with the Monroe doctrine. The greatest danger that confronts America to-day is our recent proneness to interfere in the politics, quarrels, and wars of non-American States.

Section 55 of the International Naval Conference, signed at London February 26, 1909, ratification advised by the Senate April 24, 1912, not ratified by the Senate of the United States, but ratified by some of the foreign nations, reads as follows:

> The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected before the outbreak of hostilities, is valid, unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel is exposed. There is, however, a presumption, if the bill of sale is not on board a vessel which has lost her belligerent nationality less than 60 days before the outbreak of hostilities, that the transfer is void. This presumption may be rebutted.
> Where the transfer was effected more than 30 days before the outbreak of hostilities, there is an absolute presumption that it is valid if it is unconditional, complete, and in conformity with the laws of the countries concerned, and if its effect is such that neither the control of nor the profits arising from the employment of the vessel remain in the same hands as before the transfer. If, however, the vessel lost her belligerent nationality less than 60 days before the outbreak of hostilities, and if the bill of sale is not on board the capture of the vessel gives no right to damages.

Now, what is contraband of war? We all know, but here is what the protocol says:

CONTRABAND OF WAR.

ARTICLE 22.

The following articles may, without notice, be treated as contraband of war under the name of absolute contraband:

(1) Arms of all kinds, including arms for sporting purposes, and their distinctive component parts.
(2) Projectiles, charges, and cartridges of all kinds, and their distinctive component parts.
(3) Powder and explosives specially prepared for use in war.
(4) Gun mountings, limber boxes, limbers, military wagons, field forges, and their distinctive component parts.
(5) Clothing and equipment of a distinctively military character.
(6) All kinds of harness of a distinctively military character.
(7) Saddle, draft, and pack animals suitable for use in war.
(8) Articles of camp equipment, and their distinctive component parts.
(9) Armor plates.
(10) Warships, including boats, and their distinctive component parts of such a nature that they can only be used on a vessel of war.
(11) Implements and apparatus designed exclusively for the manufacture of munitions of war, for the manufacture or repair of arms, or war material for use on land or sea.

ARTICLE 23.

Articles exclusively used for war may be added to the list of absolute contraband by a declaration, which must be notified.

Such notification must be addressed to the Governments of other powers, or to their representatives accredited to the power making the declaration. A notification made after the outbreak of hostilities is addressed only to neutral powers.

ARTICLE 24.

The following articles, susceptible of use in war as well as for purposes of peace may, without notice, be treated as contraband of war under the name of conditional contraband:

(1) Foodstuffs.
(2) Forage and grain suitable for feeding animals.
(3) Clothing, fabrics for clothing, and boots and shoes suitable for use in war.
(4) Gold and silver in coin or bullion; paper money.
(5) Vehicles of all kinds available for use in war and their component parts.
(6) Vessels, craft, and boats of all kinds; floating docks, parts of docks, and their component parts.
(7) Railway material both fixed and rolling stock, and material for telegraphs, wireless telegraphs and telephones.
(8) Balloons and flying machines and their distinctive component parts, together with accessories and articles recognizable as intended for use in connection with balloons and flying machines.
(9) Fuel; lubricants.
(10) Powder and explosives not specially prepared for use in war.
(11) Barbed wire and implements for fixing and cutting the same.
(12) Horseshoes and shoeing materials.
(13) Harness and saddlery.
(14) Field glasses, telescopes, chronometers, and all kinds of nautical instruments.

ARTICLE 25.

Articles susceptible for use in war as well as for purposes of peace other than those enumerated in articles 22 and 24 may be added to the list of conditional contraband by a declaration, which must be notified in the manner provided for in the second paragraph of article 23.

ARTICLE 26.

If a power waives, so far as it is concerned, the right to treat as contraband of war an article comprised in any of the classes enumerated in articles 22 and 24 such intention shall be announced by a declaration, which must be notified in the manner provided for in the second paragraph of article 23.

ARTICLE 27

Articles which are not susceptible of use in war may not be declared contraband of war.

ARTICLE 28.

The following may not be declared contraband of war:

(1) Raw cotton, wool, silk, jute, flax, hemp, and other raw materials of the textile industries, and yarns of the same.
(2) Oil seeds and nuts; copra.
(3) Rubber, resins, gums, and lacs; hops.
(4) Raw hides and horns, bones and ivory.
(5) Natural and artificial manures, including nitrates and phosphates for agricultural purposes.
(6) Metallic ores.
(7) Earths, clays, lime, chalk, stone, including marble, bricks, slates, and tiles.
(8) Chinaware and glass.
(9) Paper and paper-making materials.
(10) Soap, paint, and colors, including articles exclusively used in their manufacture, and varnish.

(11) Bleaching powder, soda ash, caustic soda, salt cake, ammonia, sulphate of ammonia, and sulphate of copper.
(12) Agricultural, mining, textile, and printing machinery.
(13) Precious and semiprecious stones, pearls, mother-of-pearl, and coral.
(14) Clocks and watches other than chronometers.
(15) Fashion and fancy goods.
(16) Feathers of all kinds, hairs, and bristles.
(17) Articles of household furniture and decoration; office furniture and requisites.

If this bill should pass, a foreign corporation could sell its ships to an American corporation and have the benefit of the protection of the American flag, while all of the stock of the corporation, with the exception of the few shares necessary to be held by its officers to qualify them to act, might be held by the original foreign stockholders, and still the transfer might be held by this Government to be made in good faith. But would it be so looked on by the belligerents? Would it be so held according to international law? Would our country so look on it if conditions were reversed?

There is no doubt in my mind that as soon as we pass this law some foreign Governments will immediately pass laws making it treason for their subjects to take advantage of it, and the American flag will not protect vessels so transferred from seizure as contraband of war. The seizure of one such ship would immediately embroil us in trouble with the nation that made the capture.

Should this bill be enacted, and I think it will be, I wish to call the attention of Congress to the fact that there are sufficient deck officers and engineers unemployed in the United States to officer all such ships likely to take advantage of the law. On the Pacific coast there are at the present time 400 unemployed merchant marine deck officers—250 in San Francisco, 50 in San Pedro, and 100 on Puget Sound.

If it were in order under the rule under which the bill is being considered, I would offer a substitute for it. The substitute would provide that $30,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated and placed in the hands of the President to be used by him to build, purchase, and operate ships for commerce and trade. Under that provision ships bought by the Government would certainly be bought in good faith, notwithstanding the fact that the law was enacted as an emergency and temporary measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURRY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I make a general request? I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may have the right to revise and extend their remarks and other gentlemen may have the right to print within five days on the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am going to object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this bill be given the right to extend and revise their remarks and that all gentlemen may be given the privilege of printing their remarks for five days. Is their objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, for the second time in one day we are called upon to vote for an emergency measure in haste, and this time in such haste that the bill has not been printed and is not available for examination by Members of the House. Now, there may have been some reason for great haste with regard to the emergency currency bill, but it is hard to see how the shipping interests of the country could suffer very much if we should take time to print this bill and study it.

The bill provides for American registration, under certain conditions, for foreign-built vessels, and the reason given for the proposed legislation is that our foreign commerce is likely to be very much disturbed by the war that has already begun and which, before long, is likely to involve most of the great maritime nations of the world. Why will that war disturb our foreign commerce? The reason is obvious. Ninety per cent of our $4,000,000,000 of exports and imports is carried in foreign bottoms, and these vessels, many of them, will be taken out of commercial channels. They are subsidized vessels of the powers whose flags they fly, and they will be subject to duty as auxiliary vessels of the navies. Of course, they can not be of much use as fighting vessels, but some of them are fast and can serve as scouts, while others will be used as transports or supply ships. That is where some of them will go. Those that remain in the carrying trade will, of course, be subject to capture by the warships of their enemies, and therefore very much disturbed in their attempt to carry our trade.

Other disturbances to sea-borne commerce will affect American vessels as much as those of any other power. There will be blockades of many or all of the ports of the warring nations, and it makes no difference what flag the vessel carries that attempts to run a blockade, it will be subject to capture. American vessels will have no privileges above the vessels of any other country.

Also vessels that carry contraband—and foodstuffs may be contraband—will be subject to capture. The continental doctrine of contraband and the American doctrine are not the same. According to the one, for example, food will be contraband if it is destined for the use of a fleet or for troops in the field; according to the other, the destined use of the article will have no bearing on the question, whether it is contraband or not contraband. Therefore owing to the difference which prevails on the Continent and in our own country disputes will arise, and the neutral character of our ships will not save us from these disputes.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. For a question.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose we were sending raw cotton to Germany under the American flag in one of these foreign-built ships which had secured American registry, which was to be made up into army uniforms, and it was seized on the high seas by a warship of France, what would be the consequence?

Mr. TEMPLE. If we did not recognize the seizure as legitimate, we would have a controversy with Germany about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not a fact that American ships flying the flag of the United States and loaded with flour were seized and held in Asiatic waters during the Russo-Japanese War?

Mr. TEMPLE. If they are carrying contraband, or if they try to break through a blockade, the neutral vessels of the United States are just as subject to capture as any other. Now, it seems to me that if this bill is passed it will not create any more vessels. We will have to buy, if we buy at all, either vessels that belong to some of these belligerents, in which case the question of fraudulent transfer will be raised, or we will buy vessels that belong to citizens or subjects of some neutral power. They will be just as free from capture under any other flag as they would under ours. If we buy belligerent vessels, we are hunting trouble. The neutral vessels we do not need to buy, because we can ship our goods in them without buying them.

To illustrate the danger of transferring vessels of a belligerent to a neutral flag, I would like to call attention to section 344 of our consular regulations, as quoted in the second volume of John Bassett Moore's Digest of International Law, as follows:

Consul's responsibility: The authority of a consular officer to authenticate the transfer of a foreign vessel is wide in its effects and imposes great responsibility in making him, in the first instance at least, the sole judge of the good faith of the transaction. The question of the honesty and good faith of such a sale rises into the gravest importance in the event of a war between two or more powers in which the Government of the United States is a neutral. In such a war experience justifies the expectation that the citizens or subjects of one or more of the belligerents will seek to protect their shipping by a transfer to a neutral flag. In some instances this may honestly be done, but the sales of the vessels of belligerents in apprehension of or in time of war are always and properly liable to suspicion, and they justify the strictest inquiry on the part of the belligerent who may thereby have been defrauded of his right to capture the enemy's property. The acceptance of the pretended ownership of a vessel under these circumstances may be very profitable, and the temptation to abuse his trust in such a case to which a consular officer is subjected may be too great for persons of ordinary integrity, discernment, and firmness to withstand. Instances are not wanting in which citizens of the United States who were wholly incapable, from their previous well-known condition and pursuits, of making such a purchase have appeared as owners under sales of this character and have sought for them the protection of the Government.

Now, it seems to me, with the definite announcement which has been made here that this bill is intended to be an emergency bill to meet the situation caused by the European war, the presumption of fraud in the transfer of foreign vessels to American registry would be held by a belligerent to be very great. Therefore the dangers that lie in this bill seem to me to be so great that I must vote against it.

To recapitulate: There are four ways in which the war is going to interfere with our foreign commerce. First, many merchant ships of the belligerents will be called into the naval services of their respective countries. Second, those that continue in the merchant marine will be subject to capture. Third, neutral ships carrying contraband will be subject to capture. Fourth, blockades will seriously interfere with all commerce bound to any of the countries engaged in the war.

We can not buy merchant ships of the class first mentioned; they will be in the navies. If we buy ships of the second class, we buy trouble. It will be of no use to buy vessels of the third and fourth classes, because as neutrals they already have all the rights they would have with American registry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOWDLE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has 10 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will use some time now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have but one speech on this side.

Mr. MANN. But one speech to close?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we export $2,000,000,000 worth of products a year and over. We import a billion and a half dollars' worth a year. And while a portion of these exports and imports are from Canada and Mexico, a great bulk of them must go on the high seas because of the fact—at least, that is my opinion—that men in this country receive higher pay than they do elsewhere, and that commerce on the high seas must be open to the world, and we do not have the foreign commerce in American bottoms. American capital has been better paid in other enterprises; or, if invested in shipping, by the purchase of stock in foreign companies, where the men operating the ships receive lower pay than Americans will work for when they get higher pay at home. Whatever may be the reason, not 10 per cent, it is said, of this commerce is carried in American bottoms.

Now, we are confronted with a situation where those nations of the world owning the bulk of the shipping may be at war, and their vessels be subject to capture as prizes by their enemies. Hence it is not practicable for them to engage in regular and safe commerce on the high seas. Shall we, then, destroy our foreign commerce? Shall we let our goods and produce, ready for export, rot or rust on our own shores? Or shall we endeavor to provide some method by which our cotton and our grain may be sent abroad, together with those manufactured products which we have been sending abroad to a large extent? American vessels on the high seas, so long as we are neutral, are free from seizure, unless they are carrying contraband of war.

I do not know whether it is possible to get American capital to buy these foreign vessels, many of which will be practically useless otherwise for some years if war actually occurs. But they can not buy them now and use them. Unless there is some ship room furnished, we can not send abroad our exports; we can not get rid of our cotton and our wheat. To-day the elevators are filled with wheat at all of the export points. To-day the railroads are refusing to carry wheat at all, because there is no place to store it. We have the foreign demand for it. It is sold abroad, but the foreign vessels are not safe in carrying it. Will we authorize, under these conditions, our citizens to invest American capital in the purchase of foreign vessels and carry abroad our produce that we wish to sell to foreign peoples?

The question ought to answer itself. Here is an emergency which we all recognize. It is idle to say we would not do this under normal conditions, because we do not have normal conditions. We want to send abroad our produce and our manufactures. We can only do it, if this war occurs, in vessels flying the American flag. We can not build them in time to meet the emergency. We can not send our stuff abroad unless we own them. Other people have them who want to sell. Will we buy? It is to our financial interest to make the money which is made out of the carrying trade. It is to the interest of our country to sell our produce abroad. Both interests join in favor of giving the American citizen and American capital the opportunity which the world has offered to enrich our own country and protect our own people. Therefore I think the bill ought to pass. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have favored legislation that would build up an American merchant marine that would be commensurate with the needs of our commerce and in keeping with the wants of this great Nation. I do not contend for one moment that the bill that is now pending before the House supplies that demand. It does not. If the American people and the American Congress really desire a merchant marine, there is legislation needed in the future to accomplish that result.

But to-day we face an emergency. To-day the question that confronts us is the question as to whether your elevators will be crowded with wheat this fall, selling at 25 cents a bushel and a surplus stock on hand that destroys the price; as to whether your warehouses will be filled with cotton that this country can not consume, and whether the price of your cotton shall go to 4 and 5 cents a pound, with all the attendant evils that may come from that condition; or whether, at least to some extent, you will attempt to relieve the situation.

I do not contend for a moment that this bill more than attempts to relieve the present situation. I have some figures here in my hand that were prepared by the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce showing our exports for last year and the countries that consumed them:

Figures for fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, are the latest available.

Exports from the United States to Europe	$1,479,074,761
To Great Britain	597,149,059
To Germany	331,684,212
To France	146,100,201
To the Netherlands	125,909,862
To Italy	76,285,278
To Belgium	66,845,462
To Spain	31,471,723
To Russia	25,363,795
To Austria-Hungary	23,320,696
All other Europe	54,944,473
Total	1,479,074,761

Value of our principal articles of export to Europe for fiscal year ended June 30, 1913.

Cotton (unmanufactured)	$224,783,000
Breadstuffs	142,108,000
Copper	128,421,000
Meats, etc	117,765,000
Oils	86,251,000
Oil cake	27,934,000
Woods, lumber, etc	47,406,000
Iron, steel, etc	53,824,000
Tobacco	37,792,000
Leather	33,907,000
Agricultural implements	18,867,000
Naval stores	17,191,000
Fruits and nuts	7,375,000
Furs	6,256,000
Coffee	7,571,000
Cars, autos, etc	4,500,000
Hops	4,171,000
Coal	1,288,000
All other articles	505,178,000
Total exports	1,479,074,000

They show that our exports to Europe last year were $1,479,000,000. Of that amount we exported $224,000,000 of cotton, $142,000,000 of breadstuffs, and $117,000,000 of meats.

Now, there are three agricultural products, amounting to over $602,000,000, nearly half of your exports, and how are you going to get them to Europe?

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce does not print the value of exports to Europe according to the flag of the exporting ship. The following table of the number of voyages and net tonnage of the ships gives a fair measure of the distribution by flag of our export transportation to Europe:

Clearances of vessels from the United States for Europe during the fiscal year 1912 (note these figures were not printed in detail by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for 1913. The totals for the two years are nearly the same, and national proportions will not vary much). The figures, of course, include the repeated voyages of the same ship to Europe in a year. The ship's tonnage is 100 cubic feet, which will carry 80 bushels of grain or 2¼ tons of coal.

Nationality.	Number of clearances.	Net tonnage.
British	2,504	9,814,537

Total	4,223	16,861,794
American	56	303,754
Grand total	4,279	17,165,548

For the fiscal year 1913 our exports to Europe were valued at $1,479,074,761, the net tonnage of clearances from the United States to Europe, 19,072,439 ship net tons, so each net ton of ship space averaged $78 worth of cargo carried per trip.

The net tonnage for the year 1912—the figures were not printed for 1913, so that I have to give the figures of 1912—show that, of your commerce carried to Europe in that year, 9,814,000 net tons were carried in British ships, 3,026,000 net tons were carried in German ships, and 881,000 net tons were carried in French ships. In other words, over 51 per cent of your tonnage to Europe was carried in British ships and 17 per cent in German ships, making two nations alone carrying 68 per cent of your export tonnage to Europe.

On the other hand, the lamentable condition confronts us that the tonnage carried in American ships amounted to only 303,000 net tons, or 1.7 per cent of your European export trade that was carried in American vessels.

Now, from these figures I want to call your attention to this fact, that if you exclude the ships of Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and Austria from the sea, only enough ships are left from the balance of the world that were in the foreign trade in 1912—and the same conditions existed in 1913—to carry about 14 per cent of your European exports.

What does 14 per cent of your European exports mean? That tonnage, if it continued all the year round, would carry about 190,000,000 busbels of wheat—not enough to carry your export wheat that is to go out this year. If the entire tonnage of those ships were devoted to carrying your export cotton, it would carry only about 7,000,000 bales—about the normal export of the crop of America to Europe to-day—and no wheat.

The passenger steamers on regular lines are, of course, the most valuable ships and those most likely soon to be withdrawn.

The Cunard fleet is retained under postal and admiralty subventions by the British Government as naval cruisers. British subjects only can own Cunard shares.

The faster North German Lloyd steamships are German naval auxiliaries.

The mail steamers of the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique are French naval auxiliaries.

I have carefully gone over the American seagoing merchant fleet; a very small number may afford relief under our own flag.

Our only trans-Atlantic steamers are the four American Line steamships, St. Louis, St. Paul, New York, and Philadelphia, and the American Red Star S. S. Finland and S. S. Kroonland. The four mail steamships do not carry much cargo, say, 6,000 ton avoirdupois; the Finland and Kroonland, 7,927 net, can carry about 16,000 tons avoirdupois each per voyage.

Our ships on the Pacific and in trade with Cuba, Mexico, and the coastwise ships, in the main, already are employed. None of our coastwise ships are now adapted to the export of grain or cotton across the Atlantic. They would require fitting for the purpose, and most of them have not the coal capacity. Again, our spare coastwise ships, if any, must be used to fill up gaps in our near-by foreign trade; for example, German ships to the British West Indies will withdraw.

The available fleet for relief is the American-Hawaiian fleet of 26 cargo steamers, built for the Panama Canal trade, soon to be open. Bull & Co. and Luckenbach have a few small tramp steamers for miscellaneous cargo, but they are not grain or cotton ships.

The probable European neutral maritime flags: Norway, Sweden, Denmark (?), Netherlands (?), Belgium (?), Spain. Admission to the flag of these countries, especially Norway, is relatively easy.

Now, that is the condition that confronts us. Some gentlemen say that this is not an emergency measure. If you do not ship your agricultural products to the European markets, it means disaster to every agricultural community in the United States.

Before I explain the bill I wish to call to your attention the further fact that this not only means the admitting of foreign ships to American registry, it means the admission of ships that are owned to-day by American citizens and American corporations to American registry, and authorizes them to fly the American flag instead of a foreign flag.

I have in my hand a letter, which was delivered to me a few moments ago, from the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce, in which the fact is called to my attention that the New York & Pacific Steamship Co. (Ltd.), an American corporation, has 11 ships under the British flag that have a capacity of 36,444 net tons, and yet there are only three of them that could come in under the present law, because the remainder of them were built more than five years ago. I will print the names and tonnage.

The United Fruit Co.'s vessels, owned by an American corporation flying the British flag, are nearly two dozen in number, which could come in under this law, if you pass it; but most of them could not come under our flag if you do not pass this bill, because the ships are over 5 years old. I will present the names and tonnage:

The Red Star Line is, I understand, an American-owned line now flying the Belgian flag. Of course, that is a neutral flag at this time, although nobody can predict what it will be a week or a month from now. That line has five large vessels, all of them built more than five years ago, with a tonnage capacity of nearly 42,000 net tons, that can come under the American flag if we pass this law, and now owned by American citizens. I will print the names and tonnage:

These ships alone would bring to our flag and to our country vessels that to-day belong to American citizens, flying a foreign flag, with a net tonnage of 232,000 tons. So it is futile for gentlemen to say that nothing will be accomplished by this bill. Every bit of tonnage that we bring to the American flag will help in this emergency. But the contention is made here that we are going to violate the neutrality laws if we pass this bill. What are we about to do? We have already, two years ago, passed a bill authorizing foreign ships that were not over 5 years of age to take American registry. This bill merely wipes out the 5-year limitation, and allows all foreign-built vessels to take American registry——

Mr. BRYAN. If they are owned in America.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Provided, in both instances, they are owned by American citizens or American corporations.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For a question.

Mr. HARDY. In doing that, are we not placing the United States in the same category as is now every other nation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I know, identically the same. Other nations to-day admit foreign ships to their registry without limitation. We are merely passing a law to-day to put our country on the same basis as the ships of foreign countries. Can any European country complain of that?

Mr. TEMPLE. Does not the gentleman think that when we are asked to pass a bill which changes the general policy of the United States in a matter so important as this we ought to have printed copies of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is not undue haste to ask any man of average intelligence in this House to consider a bill of three sentences. Is there any man in this House who does not understand the proposition? We are not affecting the law of to-day as to ownership. There is not one word on that subject in this bill. We are eliminating the time limit. That is all there is on that. The other propositions are just as simple. They authorize the President of the United States, in case of an emergency, in his discretion to waive temporarily the law that requires American officers to man these ships. The other proposition is one that will probably not have to be availed of. That is to authorize the President to waive the question of survey, inspection, and measurement. Most of these ships are already surveyed and measured by the Lloyds Society. Their surveys and measurements are printed and known, and the probability is that the President will never have to waive that requirement. It is only put in here as a matter of precaution and nobody can complain if it is waived.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is there any danger that this bill will invite a contravention of the convention of 1909–10?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I do not mean to say for one minute that the present European situation may not invite difficulties, but it would invite it just as much with ships flying the American flag to-day as it would with ships coming under this bill. I have in the last two days carefully examined Moore's International Law, and have gone over it thoroughly with the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. The question of ownership is the real question involved. We do not in this bill change the question of ownership one iota. Every ship that takes American registry must be owned by an American citizen or an American corporation. There never has been any question from the beginning of time that citizens of one country may not buy the ships of another country if the laws of his own country will permit him to do so.

I have not time in this discussion to call your attention to all that might be said on this subject, but I wish to invite your particular attention to the fact that the only question involved in international law as to whether a citizen of a neutral nation may buy a ship in a belligerent country is the question of good faith. If an American citizen or an American corporation in good faith buys a foreign ship the title can not be questioned. Of course, if it is a subterfuge, then international complications may arise. It has been suggested that the recent convention in London provided that all vessels purchased must have been transferred to the new owner more than 60 days before the declaration of war. That proposition was suggested, but it was vetoed by Great Britain and is not a part of international law to-day.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just for a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that the question of the good faith of the transfer will first have to be examined by our own registry officers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. And is it likely that they would determine in a questionable case that the vessel was eligible to registry, especially in view of war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think not, if they were protecting the rights of our people. But let me call your attention for a moment to what Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson said in reference to this matter. You will find this quotation in Moore's International Law, volume 2, page 1007. Mr. Jefferson said:

The persons and property of our citizens are entitled to the protection of our Government in all places where they may lawfully go. No laws forbid a merchant to buy, own, and use a foreign-built vessel. She is then his lawful property, and entitled to the protection of his Nation whenever and wherever he is lawfully using her.

That was the law when Thomas Jefferson was Secretary of State, and it is the law of nations to-day.

I shall print as a part of my remarks a statement furnished me by the Bureau of Navigation, of the Department of Commerce, concerning the bill under discussion:

STATEMENT OF BUREAU OF NAVIGATION, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

The bill has been drawn carefully in accord with recognized principles of international law, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States and by eminent Secretaries of State (Thomas Jefferson, Marcy, Cass, Evarts, and Fish).

The first section provides for the admission to American registry without restriction as to age of foreign-built vessels, "to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila." Section 5 of the Panama Canal Act of August 24, 1912, contained this provision with the limitation that such foreign-built vessels, to be entitled to registry, must not be "more than 5 years old at the time they apply for registry." The Panama Canal Act, it will be recalled, was not a party measure, but in both branches of Congress received the support and some of its provisions met the opposition of Members of all parties, respectively. The limitation of registry to relatively new ships, not always 5 years old, was to an extent a compromise based on the fact that while the House was Democratic, the Senate and Executive were Republican. The principle of free ships for foreign trade and for the Philippines (to which the coastwise-trade laws do not apply) was affirmed, but its application was limited to relatively new ships partly as a concession to those who questioned the general principle, but mainly to remove the chance to delay the passage of the Panama Canal Act through a general debate on the merchant marine and the policy of free ships. Under the Panama Canal Act there have been no applications for American registry of foreign-built ships less than 5 years old, although large amounts of American capital are known to be invested in such ships under foreign flags. In some instances those controlling such ships have taken the position that as part of their steamships were under and part over 5 years old, they did not care to divide the nationality of their fleets, putting part under the American and leaving part under foreign flags. This position is not unreasonable.

The laws of maritime nations generally at the present time admit vessels built in other countries to their registries and the use of their flags, respectively. This provision of the bill accords with the laws of other nations.

The question of the admission of foreign-built vessels to the coastwise trade has been carefully excluded from the pending measure. That question is purely domestic and admits of a wide difference of views, and would involve long discussion and delay action upon a situation which calls for immediate action. It ought not to be raised at this time.

OWNERSHIP.

American ownership, of course, is a necessary condition to the use of the American flag on a ship. Under section 5 of the Panama act, amending section 4132, Revised Statutes, the ship must be "wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporation organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States." Foreigners, of course are not prohibited from owning shares of stock to any extent in an American corporation, shipping, railroad, manufacturing, or otherwise. Our law is similar to that of other maritime nations. [By their subsidy contracts, however, with the British Government the Cunard Steamship Co., Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., and Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co., are required to keep all their stock in the hands of British subjects.] The rough-and-ready rule is that the flag of the ship and nationality of the owner must agree. Moore's Digest, volume 2, pages 1002–1076, goes fully into ownership and nationality. The "meat" of this for your purposes, I think, is in the following instructions of Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, to our minister at France during the Crimean War (Moore, vol. 2, p. 1061):

"The law of nations does not require a register or any other particular paper as expressive of the ship's national character. Laws describing the kind of papers vessels must carry are considered as regulations purely local and municipal, for purposes of public policy, and vary in different countries. As evidence that the vessel has changed owners, the bill of sale is required by the practice of maritime courts, and is generally satisfactory. Sir William Scott says: 'A bill of sale is the proper title to which the maritime courts of all countries would look. It is the universal instrument of transfer of ships in the usage of all maritime countries.'"

Also Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson (Moore, vol. 2, p. 1007):

"The persons and property of our citizens are entitled to the protection of our Government in all places where they may lawfully go. No laws forbid a merchant to buy, own, and use a foreign-built vessel. She is, then, his lawful property and entitled to the protection of his nation whenever he is lawfully using her."

NATIONALITY OF OFFICERS AND CREWS.

Up to July 28, 1864, the officers and crews of merchant vessels of the United States were required to be citizens of the United States. The restriction of the crew to American citizens was removed as an urgent war measure by the act of 1864 (13 Stats., 201), and since that time citizens or subjects of any country may act as members of the crew of American merchant vessels. In this respect our law is similar to the British law. American ocean mail steamships, however, under the postal subsidy act of 1891 (Navigation Laws, 1911 edition, top of p. 298), are required to carry a certain percentage of American citizens (at the present time 50 per cent) as members of their crews.

In fact, over half of the men composing the crews of American merchant vessels are now foreigners. The right of foreigners to serve upon neutral vessels unmolested by belligerent powers whose subjects they may be is not now questioned. Indeed, the eleventh Hague convention, promulgated by the President on February 23, 1909, makes the following liberal provisions for the protection of crews of merchant vessels of even belligerent States (Treaties and Conventions, Vol. II, p. 2348):

"ART. 5. When an enemy merchant ship is captured by a belligerent such of its crew as are nationals of a neutral State are not made prisoners of war.

The same rule applies in the case of the captain and officers likewise nationals of a neutral State, if they promise formally in writing not to serve on an enemy ship while the war lasts.

"ART. 6. The captain, officers, and members of the crew, when nationals of the enemy State, are not made prisoners of war on condition that they make a formal promise in writing not to undertake, while hostilities last, any service connected with the operations of the war.

"ART. 7. The names of the persons retaining their liberty under the conditions laid down in article 5, paragraph 2, and in article 6 are notified by the belligerent captor to the other belligerent. The latter is forbidden knowingly to employ the said persons.

"ART. 8. The provisions of the three preceding articles do not apply to ships taking part in the hostilities.

"ART. 9. The provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention."

All the watch officers of the United States must be citizens of the United States. Section 4131 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of May 28, 1896 (Navigation Laws, p. 54), provides:

"All the watch officers of vessels of the United States who shall have charge of a watch, including pilots, shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.

"The word 'officers' shall include the chief engineer and each assistant engineer in charge of a watch on vessels propelled wholly or in part by steam; and after the 1st day of January, 1897, no person shall be qualified to hold a license as a commander or watch officer of a merchant vessel of the United States who is not a native-born citizen or whose naturalization as a citizen shall not have been fully completed."

(Note.—Under British law the citizen or subject of any nation may be an officer of a British merchant ship if he is proved competent, but the laws of nations generally limit officers of their merchant vessels to their own citizens or subjects.) Section 2 of the pending bill, in a guarded manner, gives the President the discretionary power to waive the requirement of citizenship. While the need for this departure from a principle we have always followed is to be regretted, it is essential to give any efficacy to the measure.

Our export trade to Europe is almost wholly conducted in foreign steamships. For the past 20 years we have not at any one time had more than eight American steamships continuously employed in trade with Europe. Our mariners have had few opportunities to qualify themselves for the command of trans-Atlantic steamships, and it is not surprising, therefore, that there are relatively few men qualified by experience to take command as masters or first or second officers (mates) of the large steamers which carry our cotton and wheat to Europe. This situation would be serious at any time. It is doubly serious in a time of pending general European conflict, as at present. You have probably noted in the newspapers that even on the British coasts the lights on the lightships and lighthouses have been extinguished and buoys and other aids to navigation removed. The press reports may not be correct to-day, but these precautions will undoubtedly be taken very soon, if the war is general. Under these conditions ships ought to be trusted only with captains and officers familiar by experience with European coasts and ports, and, of course, shipowners will not risk their vessels with others in command.

American investors in ships under foreign flags have for 20 years maintained that even if allowed by law to take out American registry they would be reluctant to dismiss faithful and experienced captains and officers and supply their places with new and untried men.

Even in the matter of supplying the extra mates required by the act of March 3, 1913, on certain classes of American coastwise steamers the Department of Commerce has found difficulty in enforcing the law, partly on account of the scarcity of qualified men at certain times and certain places.

The second section of the bill is carefully guarded. The President is not authorized to suspend the law under any conditions as to the coasting trade. As to the foreign trade he may suspend the law only:

(1) Whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require.

(2) In so far as he may deem desirable.

Under this provision he may, for example, suspend the law only as to ships of large tonnage, or only as to certain ratings of officers—e. g., captains, but not third officers; chief engineers, but not first, second, or third assistants, etc.—or he may suspend it only in the case of a particular position to be filled on a particular ship. In every case he is to be guided by the pressing needs of our foreign trade on which the country's prosperity is to a great extent dependent and which must not be embarrassed for lack of the men competent to conduct ocean transportation under conditions of abnormal difficulty.

INSPECTION AND SURVEY.

Section 4498 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1905 (Navigation Laws for 1911, p. 114), provides:

"A register, enrollment, or license shall not be granted or other papers be issued by any collector or other chief officer of customs to any vessels subject by law to inspection under this title (R. S., 4399–4500) until all the provisions of this title applicable to such vessel have been fully complied with and until the certificate of inspection required by this title for such vessel has been filed with said collector."

The Panama Canal act (sec. 5) provides as a condition to registry that foreign-built vessels shall be "certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo." This provision offers a convenient and easily administered rule for the determination of seaworthiness by our inspectors. Practically all foreign steamers and many American steamers are classed or rated in Lloyd's Register. Lloyd's Society and Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping is an association which for 80 years has maintained a body of skilled naval architects and men trained to shipbuilding at maritime ports throughout the world for the purpose of inspecting vessels and determining their seaworthiness, according to the society's rules for the guidance of marine insurance companies. (This society must be sharply distinguished from a totally different organization or exchange, also known by the name of Lloyd's, at whose headquarters it is possible to lay speculative odds on almost any proposition.)

The first general regulation of Lloyd's Register for 1914 reads:

"Steel vessels built in accordance with the society's rules and regulations or with alternative arrangements equivalent thereto will be classed 100–A so long as they are found, upon careful and periodical survey, to be in a fit and efficient condition for the safe conveyance of dry and perishable cargoes."

This classification applies to passenger ships as well as cargo ships. By turning to the current volume of Lloyd's Register, our inspection service can at once secure from the rating 100–A prima facie evidence of the seaworthiness of a vessel applying for register. Nearly all the great cargo carriers in trans-Atlantic trade will be found to have this rating. German ships, as a rule, are classed by a corresponding German association, the Germanischer Lloyd, and French ships in a corresponding French association, the Bureau Veritas, the essential rules of which are similar to Lloyd's rule. If in any case, however, the Panama Canal provision should cause delay, the pending bill, second section, second paragraph, gives the President power to waive that requirement, as well as section 4498, Revised Statutes, and permit the American registration of the ship on her foreign certificate of seaworthiness. Probably few occasions requiring the exercise of this power will arise, and then only in the case of a smaller cargo steamer or when inspectors are not immediately available. Our laws already provide for the recognition of foreign certificate of inspection of passenger ships. The act of March 17, 1906, provides:

"* * * That when such foreign passenger steamers belong to countries having inspection laws approximating those of the United States, and have unexpired certificates of inspection issued by the proper authorities in the respective countries to which they belong, they shall be subject to no other inspection than necessary to satisfy the local inspectors that the condition of the vessel, her boilers, and life-saving equipments are as stated in the current certificate of inspection." * * *

MEASUREMENT.

Section 4148, Revised Statutes, provides (Navigation Laws, p. 22):

"Before any vessel shall be registered, she shall be measured by a surveyor, if there be one, or by the person he shall appoint, at the port or place where the vessel may be, and if there be none, by such person as the collector of the district within which she may be shall appoint." * * *

The laws of other maritime nations contain similar provisions, and, broadly speaking, the Moorsom system of measuring the tonnage of vessels has been in use through the maritime world for some years. The application of the broad principles of the system is the same everywhere, but in some particulars there are minor differences. The second section of the bill, second paragraph, enables the President, if necessary, to direct a suspension of section 4148, Revised Statutes, in any given case. If a vessel be loaded with cargo it is, of course, difficult or impossible to measure her internal contents in cubic feet. If measurement in any case be waived, the foreign measurement certificate, which every foreign ship carries, will be temporarily accepted. This provision of the bill involves no departure from a principle, already established by section 2 of the act of August 5, 1882 (Navigation Laws, p. 31):

"Whenever it is made to appear to the Secretary of Commerce (and Labor) that the rules concerning the measurement for tonnage of vessels of the United States have been substantially adopted by the government of any foreign country, he may direct that the vessels of such foreign country be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of register or other national papers, and thereupon it shall not be necessary for such vessels to be measured at any port in the United States; and when it shall be necessary to ascertain the tonnage of any vessel not a vessel of the United States, the said tonnage shall be ascertained in the manner provided by law for the measurement of vessels of the United States."

EXEMPTION OF PRIVATE PROPERTY.

While it is not immediately pertinent to the bill, it may be worth noting that since the Paris conference of 1856 the United States has stood generally in favor of the principle of exempting all private property at sea (except contraband or blockade runners) from capture, but nations have not yet agreed. Our latest expression was House joint resolution of April 28, 1904 (33 Stats., 592):

"Joint resolution relating to the exemption of all private property at sea not contraband of war from capture or destruction by belligerent powers:

"Resolved, etc., That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that it is desirable, in the interest of uniformity of action by the maritime States of the world in time of war, that the President endeavor to bring about an understanding among the principal maritime powers with a view of incorporating into the permanent law of civilized nations the principle of the exemption of all private property at sea not contraband of war from capture or destruction by belligerents."

SALES IN FOREIGN PORTS.

The attached from the State Department instructions (1896) gives the regulations for consuls when American citizens buy ships abroad. While not directly pertinent to the bill, some question about it may come up in debate.

Consular regulations of 1896.

ARTICLE 20.

AMERICAN OR FOREIGN BUILT VESSELS TRANSFERRED ABROAD TO CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

341. Right to acquire property in foreign ships: The right of citizens of the United States to acquire property in foreign ships has been held to be a natural right, independent of statutory law, and such property is as much entitled to protection by the United States as any other property of a citizen of the United States.

* * * * * * *

344. Consul's responsibility: The authority of a consular officer to authenticate the transfer of a foreign vessel is wide in its effects and imposes great responsibility in making him, in the first instance, at least, the sole judge of the good faith of the transaction. The question of the honesty and good faith of such a sale rises into the gravest importance in the event of a war between two or more powers in which the Government of the United States is a neutral. In such a war experience justifies the expectation that the citizens or subjects of one or more of the belligerents will seek to protect their shipping by a transfer to a neutral flag. In some instances this may honestly be done; but the sales of vessels of belligerents in apprehension of or in time of war are always and properly liable to suspicion, and they justify the strictest inquiry on the part of the belligerent who may thereby have been defrauded of his right to capture the enemy's property. The acceptance of the pretended ownership of a vessel under these circumstances may be very profitable; and the temptation to abuse his trust in such a case to which a consular officer is subjected may be too great for persons of ordinary integrity, discernment, and firmness to withstand. Instances are not wanting in which citizens of the United States who were wholly incapable, from their previous well-known condition and pursuits, of making such a purchase have appeared as owners under sales of this character and have sought for them the protection of the Government.

* * * * * * *

346. Certificate, when to be issued: When a consular officer shall have satisfied himself, after the investigation with which he is charged, that the sale of a vessel is not fictitious and is made in good faith, and that the purchaser is a citizen of the United States, it is his duty, when requested, to record the bill of sale in the consulate, and to deliver the original to the purchaser, with his certificate annexed thereto, according to Form No. 35. A copy of the bill of sale, together with any other papers belonging to the transfer, and of the consular certificate should be sent without delay to the Department of State, with a report of the facts and circumstances of the transaction.

347. Right to fly the flag: The privilege of carrying the flag of the United States is under the regulation of Congress, and it may have been the intention of that body that it should be used only by regularly documented vessels. No such intention, however, is found in any statute. And as a citizen is not prohibited from purchasing and employing abroad a foreign ship, it is regarded as reasonable and proper that he should be permitted to fly the flag of his country as an indication of ownership and for the due protection of his property. The practice of carrying the flag by such vessels is now established. The right to do so will not be questioned, and it is probable that it would be respected by the courts.

348. Disabilities of foreign-built vessels: It should be understood that foreign-built vessels not registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States, although wholly owned by citizens thereof, can not legally import goods, wares, or merchandise from foreign ports, and are not allowed in the coasting trade. (R. S., secs. 2497, 4311.)

349. Forfeiture and tonnage duties: On arrival from a foreign port undocumented foreign-built vessels, if laden with goods, wares, or merchandise, may, with their cargoes, be subjected to forfeiture. (R. S., sec. 2497; see Tariff Act of 1894, sec. 15.) If in ballast only, or with passengers without cargo, they will be subject to a discriminating tonnage duty. (R. S., sec. 4219; 19 Stat. L., 250.) When in foreign ports they are also subject to tonnage and other consular fees from which regularly documented vessels are exempt. For instructions respecting the shipment and discharge and relief of seamen on vessels of this character, and the collection of extra wages, consular officers are referred to the several articles on these subjects.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SMALL. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from North Carolina ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to those requests until after the bill is passed, so that they will not appear to have been made before the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN EUROPE (H. DOC. NO. 1136).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The present disturbances in Europe, with the consequent interruption of transportation facilities, the increase in living expenses, coupled with the difficulty of obtaining money from this country, have placed a large number of American citizens, temporarily or permanently resident in Europe, in a serious situation, and have made it necessary for the United States to provide relief and transportation to the United States or to places of safety.

The situation has also thrown upon our diplomatic and consular officers an enormous burden in caring for the interests of Americans in the disturbed areas and makes it necessary to provide for greatly increased expenses.

In view of the exigency of the situation as above outlined, I recommend the immediate passage by the Congress of an act appropriating $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed at the disposal of the President, for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, for personal services, and for other expenses which may be incurred in connection with or growing out of the existing disturbance in Europe.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 3, 1914.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 312) for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, and for other purposes.

Resolved, etc., That for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens, for personal services, and for other expenses which may be incurred in connection with or growing out of the existing political disturbances in Europe, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President: Provided, That American citizens to whom relief is extended or transportation is furnished hereunder shall pay to or reimburse the United States all reasonable expenses so incurred, respectively, on their account, if financially able to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will please wait until we dispose of some minor matters.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. SMALL, Mr. HARDY, Mr. CANTOR, Mr. BEAKES, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, Mr. DONOHOE, Mr. LOGUE, and Mr. THACHER severally asked unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire where these remarks will be inserted in the permanent RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ordered such extension of remarks to be printed at the end of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean printed in the daily RECORD, but I mean inserted in the permanent RECORD. Here is what I want to get at: We passed this bill as an emergency measure without much debate. When the permanent RECORD is issued it may show debate enough to last a week. I do not want it to show that. I want it to show the fact that it was an emergency matter. I have no objection to gentlemen extending their remarks in the RECORD, provided that it does not appear that the debate continued a long time.

Mr. PAYNE. I am in favor of these gentlemen extending remarks, for it acts as a safety valve.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed the people who have charge of the RECORD to print these speeches that are never delivered at the last end of the RECORD. Now, that applies to the daily RECORD, and I do not see why it should not apply to the permanent RECORD.

Mr. MANN. It does not apply to the permanent RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Where a Member makes a speech on the floor and then wants to extend his remarks a little, it ought to be put in where the debate occurred.

Mr. MANN. I take it that these speeches will be inserted in the RECORD, if permission is given under the order now granted, at the place at which the request is made.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois objected to the requests of two Members, and now the request is made by these Members with others that their remarks may be extended in the RECORD, and under the rule adopted it will be necessary that their remarks appear under a headline of "Extension of remarks."

The SPEAKER. At the end of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken. In the permanent RECORD these headlines do not appear.

Mr. BARNHART. Then, they would appear in the order that they come in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. If the speeches are to be printed in the order in which the requests are made I have no objection, but gentlemen assume that they can go back and have the speeches inserted in the permanent RECORD before the passage of the bill, and I do not wish to consent to that.

Mr. BARNHART. If there is not a rule against such a procedure there ought to be.

Mr. MANN. There is not any.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] has more control over the RECORD than anybody else.

Mr. BARNHART. And that is nothing at all.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that some one ought to have the power to put these speeches where they belong.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I made a few remarks before the House decided to consider this bill. Afterwards I asked unanimous consent to extend those remarks in the RECORD. Can I extend those remarks that I made before the House decided to consider the bill and have them appear at that place?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. Is there objection to the requests of these several gentlemen to extend their remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two House on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 15959. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 16345. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 17482. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On July 21, 1914:

H. R. 11006. An act authorizing the disposal of a portion of the Fort Bidwell Indian School, Cal.;

H. R. 12166. An act for the relief of Jennie S. Sherman or her heirs; and

H. R. 13133. An act for the approving and payment of the drainage assessments on Indian lands in Salt Creek drainage district No. 2, in Pottawatomie County, Okla.

On July 22, 1914:

H. R. 11317. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Newcastle, Ind.

On July 23, 1914:

H. R. 1694. An act to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations"; and

H. R. 9362. An act for the relief of R. B. Whitacre & Co.

On July 25, 1914:

H. R. 8660. An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act granting a franchise for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii," approved August 1, 1912; and

H. R. 15320. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard section 33 of the public-buildings act of March 4, 1913, as to site at Owego, N. Y.

On July 29, 1914:

H. R. 17824. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

On July 30, 1914:

H. R. 16579. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. John River at Fort Kent, Me.;

H. R. 17005. An act authorizing the fiscal court of Pike County, Ky., to construct a bridge across Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Williamson, W. Va.; and

H. R. 16294. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

On July 31, 1914:

H. R. 15110. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept conveyance of title to certain land between the post-office site and Madison Street in the city of Thomasville, Ga.; and

H. R. 8688. An act for the relief of Lucien P. Rogers.

On August 1, 1914:

H. R. 12579. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; and

H. R. 17041. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

On August 3, 1914:

H. R. 4988. An act to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

MAINTENANCE OF A QUORUM.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some days ago in answer to a question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I stated that I hoped the appropriation bills and urgent matters would soon be concluded, and that the membership of the House would have an opportunity to go home for a short time. That may mislead some gentlemen, and I desire to correct the matter. I think under existing conditions it is not safe not to have a quorum in Washington, and I hope that the membership will stay here at least until we can see further into the future.

I think the gentlemen who have stayed here through this long summer and have answered the roll calls and "stayed on the job" deserve great credit for it, and the commendation of the country and their constituents, but I want to say also that I think the gentlemen who have not been here, who have been away the greater part of the last 60 days, ought to be willing to do their turn at the wheel [applause], and I say this in the hope that what I say will be carried by the press of the country, and that in this critical time the absentees who are with their own people will return to the roll call of the House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, the Chair would like to add a sentence or two to the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama. Two or three times we have considered the proposition of issuing warrants for absent Members. The only reason that was not done on Saturday last was on account of the peculiar circumstances in which we found ourselves. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had announced that at 3 o'clock he was going to raise the point of no quorum. There was not a quorum present, and it was 1 o'clock when we found we had none. It would have taken an hour or two to obtain a quorum, so it would have been ineffectual. The Chair desires to state, however, that the next time there is no quorum present, if no Member does voluntarily, the Chair will ask some Member to move to issue warrants to arrest the absentees and drag them into the House. [Applause.] It will not do any Member any good to be arrested and brought in here, for it will not add a particle to his renown or to his comfort.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to address the House, but I desire to get a matter before the House. This is unanimous-consent day. There is a long calendar of unanimous-consent bills—I do not recall how many, but there are five and a half pages of the calendar. I am told that there are seventy-odd bills. The day is mostly gone with emergency matters. It would probably take a day or two, and perhaps more, to get through this calendar. It has always been customary, as I recall, before Congress adjourns, to run through the calendar of bills to be considered by unanimous consent. As this day is practically gone, I would ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and other gentlemen in the House if it would not be practicable to reach an agreement that at the end of the consideration of the general dam bill, or the post-office bill, which is to follow, the Calendar for Unanimous Consent shall be called and proceeded with until completed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is a good one.

Before answering his question, if he will permit, I would like to make a statement to the membership of the House. I understand that just at this moment the Senate has placed upon the currency bill an amendment. It may be necessary for the House to act upon it to-night, or to send it to conference, and I want to ask the Members not to break a quorum until that bill gets through here to-night. It will be here in a few minutes.

Mr. MANN. It depends upon when it comes over here as to whether we will have a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I just wanted to call the matter to the attention of the House, so that the membership would know that the bill had not been finally disposed of.

Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to get the dam bill out of the way to-morrow, if possible, and the post-office bill out of the way on Thursday. I ask unanimous consent that business that is in order to-day may be in order on Friday next.

Mr. MANN. Why not make it so that following the disposition of the post-office bill, assuming that follows the dam bill, it shall be in order to proceed with the Calendar for Unanimous Consent until completed, not to interfere with privileged business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have any such arrangement, with the understanding that it would not interfere with District of Columbia day.

Mr. MANN. Not to interfere with District day or Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the general dam bill is disposed of and the Moon bill in reference to railway mail pay, etc., is disposed of, it shall be in order to take up bills that are on the Unanimous Consent Calendar at that time and consider them for unanimous consent as if it were of to-day, until disposed of, not to interfere with District day or Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Until the calendar is disposed of?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman's request include business of to-day—that is to say, not only unanimous consent but suspension of the rules?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. Why not take up some business that is in order under suspension of the rules for to-day and include that in this unanimous-consent request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that if we did that there would be suspension days until the end of the session. You can not include that. I would be very glad to have a suspension day a little later on, and I will be glad to ask unanimous consent for one if we can get it, but you could not include it in this order.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what disposition, if any, can be made of bills reported from the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs and certain other committees that are now upon the Private Calendar, that calendar having been previously considered by unanimous consent, and the calendar has been entirely gone through, and now is starting back from the beginning, but there has been no time to consider bills to which objection is made? I am sorry to state there appears to be one Member who seems to be conscientiously opposed to the passage of any bills emanating from the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs which seek to correct the wrongs that have been done certain military and naval officers in reference to their reinstatement or otherwise, and some of these bills are very just and important bills. In a great many instances the War Department and the Navy Department have insisted upon having these bills passed and we can get no consideration. What opportunity will there be to consider the Private Calendar where one Member only has interposed an objection to these bills to which the committees have given serious consideration and recommend them favorably for passage?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I do not think that can be relieved by a unanimous-consent order at this time, and I think that the only relief is either under suspension or by a rule at a later day.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman think there will be an opportunity where these bills can be finally considered upon their merits on the floor of the House without the interposition of the objection of one Member?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be glad to see an opportunity given for reasonable consideration of these bills, but I can not say whether there will be an opportunity.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will withhold that for a moment in order to enable me to ask the floor leader a question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withholds it, well and good; if he does not, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. BARTON. Make it brief; we do not want discussion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withhold it?

Mr. BARTON. I will temporarily withhold it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House, before any agreement is made precluding the conservation bills, that this is the situation: In a word, the House has heretofore appropriated $35,000,000 for a Government railroad in Alaska, as the House will recall. I did not vote for it or support it. I do, however, feel that we ought to unlock that coal and at least give the new railway a chance to succeed. As the matter stands now, you can not get a bushel of coal to build a fire in a cook stove. The coal fields are all tied up, and it would be a travesty to adjourn without doing something. There has been on the calendar for a long time the Alaska coal-leasing bill and other like conservation bills, and I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has a radium bill with reference to the conservation of the West, and inasmuch as we have to stay here all summer I very much hope that no agreement or arrangement will be made whereby we can not have some consideration of at least the Alaskan coal bill. We are pledged to an opening of Alaska in our platform. We owe it to Alaska and the people up there to open it. No one can defend our failure to open it after the railway has been authorized. I repeat, this Congress should not adjourn without action. I hope things will soon clear up here, so there will be a chance to take up the conservation program.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state for the enlightenment of everybody concerned that, judging the future by the past, we get through with two or three pages of this Unanimous Consent Calendar a day, and that is all the House will get through with ordinarily, too. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that there are five pages and one-half, which will make it certain to run about two days, and possibly more. Now, can the gentlemen make up their opinion on that state of facts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] that I think he is in better condition to-day and has better chances to get up his bill than on Saturday or the day before

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because it looks now that we will have to keep a quorum here, and in that event, and as the rule has been agreed upon for the consideration of his bill, I think there is a better opportunity for him to get it up than if the necessity for a quorum had not arisen.

Mr. FERRIS. I am glad to hear the leader of the majority say that.

Mr. FOWLER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. If this unanimous consent is given for bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, will there be any opportunity for considering other business while that unanimous-consent agreement is in force?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MANN. I think the request was as to privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. There are certain sorts of business that are excepted by the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman a question, and I think it would clarify matters somewhat. The unanimous-consent proposition, reasonably speaking, would be disposed of in a week or 10 days, would it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so, but I see no objection. We have taken this day away from the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I would be willing to substitute Friday for it, or dispose of the calendar. I will say this to the gentleman, that the Unanimous Consent Calendar, so far as the transaction of business is concerned, is the best calendar we have, and although it does not help some of us, it helps out more Members of this House than any other proceeding we go through.

Mr. FINLEY. But in the main the gentleman's request covers the dam bill and the post-office bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. And provides for the consideration of those two bills first, and then unanimous consent follows?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that when the Adamson dam bill and the Moon post-office bill are disposed of, the Unanimous Consent Calendar will be in order, except on Mondays and Wednesdays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Except, if I understood it correctly, on District days and Calendar Wednesdays?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous Consent Calendar would be in order on the other two Mondays anyway. The request excepts District day, Wednesdays, and privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. I object.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MONTANA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill which the Clerk will report, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 657. An act to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects within the State of Montana, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. What is the Senate amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know. It is a Senate bill with House amendments, to which the Senate disagrees. I ask unanimous consent that the House consent to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 657. An act to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects within the State of Montana, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH.

CORRECTION OF VOTE.

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD of Saturday last, August 1, on page 13126, shows that I was absent and not voting. I desire to have the RECORD corrected to show that I was present and did vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. BARTON. To submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTON. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BROWN] just requested that he be recorded as having been present and voting "aye." Now the query came to me, supposing that was a tie vote, would you still count that vote? Does that vote count?

The SPEAKER. That vote does not count. The way of it is that the statement goes into the RECORD.

Mr. BARTON. But the vote is not counted?

The SPEAKER. No. The Clerk will report the next bill.

SCHOOL LANDS IN OREGON.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 49, an act to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF IMMATURE CALVES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1818) to regulate the interstate transportation of immature calves.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], who has charge of this bill, is not here, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] had an agreement with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] by which he would offer an amendment, and with the amendment accepted the bill would be allowed to pass.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] had an agreement with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] by which the gentleman from Texas was to offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person, firm, or corporation shall ship or deliver for shipment, nor shall any common carrier, nor the receiver, trustee, or lessee thereof, receive for transportation or transport from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia any live calf not accompanied by its mother unless the same is 6 weeks old or over: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may make rules and regulations permitting, in cases of emergency only, the shipment in interstate commerce of live calves less than 6 weeks old; and the Secretary of Agriculture may also permit, under such restrictions as he may deem proper, one shipment in interstate commerce of live calves less than 6 weeks old and over 3 weeks old when the entire time consumed in such interstate shipment to final destination, including time of loading and unloading, does not exceed 12 hours.

SEC. 2. That any person, firm, or corporation, or any common carrier or the receiver, trustee, or lessee thereof, who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $50 for each calf offered for shipment, shipped, or received for transportation or transported in violation of any of the provision of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know something about this bill and the proposed amendments.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, on two former occasions I objected to the consideration of this bill. On the last unanimous-consent day the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] was very anxious to have the bill passed, and I agreed with him then that if we could agree upon an amendment changing the word "six," on page 1, line 12, to the word "four," and the word "six," on page 2, line 3, to the word "four" I would have no objection to the passage of the bill.

In the meantime, I have had communication with the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas and with the National Cattle Raisers' Association, and while a great many of their members object to any limitation as to age whatever, a considerable number thought that to meet the evil that the gentleman from Michigan sought to reach it would be advisable to accept the bill with a four months' limitation; and with that understanding I have agreed not to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is there anything in this bill requiring an affidavit on the part of the shipper, or anything to show the age of the calf that is shipped?

Mr. GARNER. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Without that, would not the bill be absolutely useless?

Mr. GARNER. I am inclined to think that the Secretary of Agriculture, in whose hands the enforcement of this law would rest, would be likely to enforce it under the general provisions of law authorizing him to inspect and pass upon the proper cattle to be killed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am in favor of the bill, providing there is some provision by which it can be enforced; but when a calf is shipped from one point to another no one knows its age.

Mr. GARNER. I am informed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that under the general statute now governing the interstate shipment of cattle the Secretary of Agriculture has certain powers to enforce rules and regulations and inflict penalties therefor, and this would come under that regulation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under this bill I do not know how they can arrive at the age of a calf.

Mr. GARNER. Well, the gentleman from Kentucky is not very familiar with the age of cattle. From the time a calf is 4 weeks old until it is 12 weeks old it is difficult to tell the age, but before 4 weeks it is not difficult. With a yearling it is difficult to tell the age, except by "toothing it."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, with an amendment:

"In House amendment No. 1 strike out "and" and insert "in so far as the total issue of said notes is limited to $500,000,000."

The Senate insists upon its amendment to the amendment of the House No. 1, and asks a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OWEN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EMERGENCY CURRENCY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference asked for by the Senate in the message just read as to the bill S. 6192, to amend section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Let us hear the Senate amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, can we not have read the perfected text?

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Virginia give the gentleman from Illinois his attention?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does this keep the limit on or remove the limit of $500,000,000?

Mr. GLASS. It removes the limit as to the aggregate amount of $500,000,000, but it leaves the restriction as to the individual bank.

Mr. MANN. Under the Federal reserve act there is no limit?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. MANN. This follows the lines of the Federal reserve act?

Mr. GLASS. Exactly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. GLASS, Mr. KORBLY, and Mr. HAYES.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that we expect to bring the bill back to the House in a little while.

Mr. MANN. I do not think you can do that to-night.

INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF IMMATURE CALVES.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MURDOCK. The bulls and the bears having been taken care of. [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will send up his amendments.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I can indicate the amendments orally: On page 1, line 12, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four."

Mr. MANN. You want to commence with line 9.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; on line 9, thanks to the gentleman from Illinois; on line 9, page 1, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four."
Page 1, line 12, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four."
Page 2, line 3, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendments are agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, so far as the amendments are concerned, I object to an agreement to the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, just one word on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 1.

Mr. MANN. Let them all go together.

Mr. HOWARD. All of them may be considered together, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill, in my judgment, is one of great importance to the people of this country, and I think the adoption of the amendment will destroy the beneficent effect of this act to a very large extent. We all know that annually there is a decrease in the production of beef cattle in this country. We know that the real reason is the slaughter of young calves.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I know that the gentleman from Georgia is fair, and that he would not seek to take advantage of a situation that might be obtained by unfair means. The gentleman knows that we are considering the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I interviewed the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], the author of the bill, and also the chairman of the committee that reported the bill, the leader of the minority, and others who I thought were interested in this bill. I asked them if they would accept an amendment making it four weeks, and they said they would. The result was that I gave my consent to the consideration of the bill with the understanding that "four weeks" be inserted in the place of "six weeks." My objection would have prevented the consideration of the bill at all. Now, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] wants to take advantage of that situation, or if the House wants to do it, I shall have to submit, but I suggest to the gentleman that that is a little unfair.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not assume that any agreement that four or five gentlemen may have made about a piece of general legislation that my constituency is as much interested in as the constituency of the gentleman from Texas will bind me in my vote or my action on this floor. I am no party to this agreement.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to suggest to my colleague that I am in hearty sympathy with his statement about the increase of beef cattle by preserving the infants of the species, and I will say to him that our committee have under consideration several bills to prevent the slaughter and shipment in interstate commerce of calves of the male persuasion under a certain age and of the females as long as they will procreate. What we will do with those bills depends on the degree of favor and support which Members give to them; and a number of us are in favor of some means of the sort similar to those in force in Argentina, where they preserve their calves until they grow up to cowhood and steerhood. If something is not done in that line, the price of meat will continue to soar in time of peace as well as in time of war; and if the gentleman will permit the passage of this little bill, of local benefit in certain sections, we will consider the other matters as fast as we can; and if he will help us, we will get something done on the subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not want to appear to be a party to the breaking of any agreement. I do not want to be a party to impeding the progress of the passage of this bill, but I think the amendment is a bad one. When this bill is up for consideration I think this House has a perfect right to pass upon the amendment, and if in their wisdom they think it ought to be six weeks instead of four weeks they ought to be allowed to make the bill read in that way without having their motives impugned. I wish the limit were 12 months instead of 4 or 6 weeks. [Applause.] I think it would be the best piece of legislation that we have passed in years. The slaughter of calves a week or 10 days old in this country is the real reason for the decrease in the production of beef cattle.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Do the provisions of this bill prevent the shipping of calves under 4 weeks old?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes. That is what I understand by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. NORTON. I call attention to the fact that it prohibits the shipping of calves only in case they are alive. It does not apply to the slaughtered calves at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It does not prevent their being slaughtered when they reach their destination. The shipments may be for the purpose of slaughter. I do not see a particle of use in the bill myself. I think the gentleman from Georgia is quite right, that we are wasting time in futile and useless legislation on this kind of a bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Absolutely, the bill as presented now with the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is not worth the snap of your finger. It does not amount to a row of pins. It gives no relief. You destroy the efficacy of the bill by reducing the age, and as far as any effect of increase in the production of beef is concerned, it will be an absolute failure. I am going to vote for this bill if I can do nothing better, but when I vote for it I realize I am voting for a piece of legislation that amounts to absolutely nothing, and let it go at that. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken; and on a division there were 57 ayes and 12 noes.

So the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 2, line 2, by striking out the word "one" and inserting the word "veal."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, at the end of the line, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "veal."

Mr. MANN. That amendment is necessary, is it not?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not see any harm that can be done by it.

Mr. MANN. Can not the gentleman see harm if it is not adopted?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF KLAMATH RIVER INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10848) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the disposition and sale of lands known as the Klamath River Indian Reservation," approved June 17, 1892 (27 Stat. L., 52-53).

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman desire information?

Mr. MANN. No; I want to give some. I do not know whether it would be agreeable to the gentleman and other Members of the House to authorize the expenditure of not to exceed $10,000 for the construction of road or trails to connect this reservation with the ocean. I would not be willing to give unanimous consent for any more than that. Of course the bill is not in a shape to amend by the insertion of a few words. It would require a redrafting of the bill to do that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would not object. I would be willing to accept $10,000, although the department has asked for $25,000.

Mr. MANN. The department has not done that. The department asked for the building of a road and doing a lot of other things. The trouble is you can not get anything out of the department.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am willing to accept an amendment limiting it to $10,000.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better ask that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REGULATION OF THE CATCHING OF SPONGES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16269) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States or person owing duty of obedience to the laws of the United States, or any boat or vessel of the United States, or person belonging to or on any such boat or vessel, to take or catch, by any means or method, in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, any commercial sponges measuring when wet less than 5 inches in their maximum diameter, or to land, deliver, cure, offer for sale, or have in possession at any port or place in the United States, or on any boat or vessel of the United States any such commercial sponges.

SEC. 2. That the presence of sponges of a diameter of less than 5 inches on any vessel or boat of the United States engaged in sponging in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, or the possession of any sponges of less than the said diameter sold or delivered by such vessels, shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this act.

SEC. 3. That every person, vessel, or boat guilty of a violation of this act shall be liable to a fine of 50 cents for each sponge of a less diameter than 5 inches found in the possession of such person, vessel, or boat, and such fine shall be a lien against the vessel or boat on which the offense is committed, and said vessel or boat shall be seized and proceeded against by process of libel in any court having jurisdiction of the offense.

SEC. 4. That any violation of this act shall be prosecuted in the district court of the United States of the district wherein the offender is found or into which he is first brought.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce to enforce the provisions of this act, and he is authorized to empower such officers and employees of the Department of Commerce as he may designate, or such officers and employees of other departments as may be detailed for the purpose, to make arrests and seize vessels and sponges, and, upon his request to the Secretary of the Treasury, may employ the vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service or the employees of the Customs Service to that end.

SEC. 6. That the act approved June 20, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate the landing, delivery, cure, and sale of sponges," and all other laws in conflict herewith, be, and the same hereby are, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was the intent of the framers of this bill to bring within its provisions and under its penalties any person anywhere in the United States who might have in his or their possession, at least for the purposes of sale, sponges less than 5 inches in diameter?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill provides that it shall be unlawful—

That on and after the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or person owing duty of obedience to the laws of the United States, or any boat or vessel of the United States, or person belonging to or on any such boat or vessel, to take or catch, by any means or method, in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, any commercial sponges measuring when wet less than 5 inches in their maximum diameter, or to land, deliver, cure, offer for sale, or have in possession at any port or place in the United States, or on any boat or vessel of the United States, any such commercial sponges.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the first three lines of the bill, reading as follows:

That on and after the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or person owing duty of obedience to the laws of the United States—

Then go over to the second page, line 4—or have in possession at any port or place in the United States, or on any boat or vessel of the United States, any such commercial sponges.

It was not intended, as I understand, to render liable to punishment a dealer in sponges who might have for sale a sponge less than 5 inches in diameter?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It was not.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman from Missouri certain that the first section is not subject to such a construction?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hardly think so. The bill provides that it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States or person owing duty or obedience to the laws of the United States, or any boat or vessel or person belonging to any such boat or vessel, to take or catch, by any of the means mentioned, sponges measuring, when wet, less than 5 inches in their maximum diameter, or to land, deliver, cure, or offer for sale, or have in their possession at any port or place in the United States, any such commercial sponges. It can not by any construction apply to a merchant or dealer in the United States who may have in his possession sponges less than 5 inches in diameter.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to take the opinion of the gentleman from Missouri with regard to the matter, but it seemed to me that the language might be interpreted possibly to bring within its penalties persons who in good faith might have sponges in their possession less than 5 inches in diameter—dealers in that sort of thing, druggists, and so forth. If the gentleman from Missouri is very certain that the act will not bear such construction, I have no disposition to object, because I understand that this bill is intended to cure a bad practice and put an end to an abuse of a legitimate industry, that is very largely reducing the output of sponges along the Gulf. In view of the importance of the legislation and the assurance of the gentleman from Missouri that the act will not warrant the construction I have suggested, I shall not object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that it will not. A question was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the other day as to the application of the bill to foreigners. This will be provided for by amendment later on.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 5313, of similar tenor, be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill S. 5313 be considered in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill is as follows:

An act (S. 5313) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or person owing duty of obedience to the laws of the United States, or any boat or vessel of the United States, or person belonging to or on any such boat or vessel, to take or catch, by any means or method, in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, any commercial sponges measuring when wet less than 5 inches in their maximum diameter, or to land, deliver, cure, offer for sale, or have in possession at any port or place in the United States, or on any boat or vessel of the United States, any such commercial sponges.

SEC. 2. That the presence of sponges of a diameter of less than 5 inches on any vessel or boat of the United States engaged in sponging in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida outside of State territorial limits, or the possession of any sponges of less than the said diameter sold or delivered by such vessels, shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this act.

SEC. 3. That every person, vessel, or boat guilty of a violation of this act shall be liable to a fine of 50 cents for each sponge of a less diameter than 5 inches found in the possession of such person, vessel, or boat, and said fine shall be a lien against the vessel or boat on which the offense is committed, and said vessel or boat shall be seized and proceeded against by process of libel in any court having jurisdiction of the offense.

SEC. 4. That any violation of th's act shall be prosecuted in the district court of the United States of the district wherein the offender is found or into which he is first brought.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce to enforce the provisions of this act, and he is authorized to empower such officers and employees of the Department of Commerce as he may designate, or such officers and employees of other departments as may be detailed for the purpose, to make arrests and seize vessels and sponges, and upon his request to the Secretary of the Treasury may employ the vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service or the employees of the Customs Service to that end.

SEC. 6. That the act approved June 20, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate the landing, delivery, cure, and sale of sponges" and all other laws in conflict herewith be, and the same hereby are, repealed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments to the Senate bill, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Between the words "or" and "to," in line 1, page 2, insert the words "any person or vessel," so that the Senate bill as amended will read "their maximum diameter, or any person or vessel to land, deliver, cure, etc."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 12, by striking out after the word "person" the words "vessel, or boat," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "partnership or association" so that the line will read "that every person, partnership, or association guilty of a violation of this act, etc."

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, strike out the words beginning with the figures "50," in line 13, down to and including the word "said," in line 15, and in lieu thereof insert the words "not less than $5 nor more than $500, in addition and such," so that the bill as amended will read "violation of this act shall be liable to a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $500 in addition, and such fine shall be a lien against the vessel or boat, etc."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in respect to this amendment fixing the fine at not less than $5 nor more than $500, I will state that in the codification of the criminal code there is no place where there is a minimum fine. We had carried minimum fines in acts of Congress for many years, and the codifiers, which was ratified by Congress, decided that the way to do was to make a maximum fine. Of course, it is immaterial whether a minimum fine of $5 is fixed here or not, yet it is desirable to have the criminal laws where they have been codified enacted in a uniform manner. Would not the gentleman be willing to amend the bill by providing that the fine shall be not more than $500?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is all right.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the amendment by fixing it so that it would read, if agreed to, that the fine be not more than $500.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "less than $5 nor," so that the amendment as amended will read "not more than $500, and in addition such," etc.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

ISSUANCE OF HOMESTEAD PATENTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16296) to provide for issuing of patents for public lands claimed under the homestead laws by deserted wives.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any case in which persons have regularly initiated claims to public lands as settlers thereon under the provisions of the homestead laws and the wife of such homestead settler or entryman, while residing upon the homestead claim and prior to submission of final proof of residence, cultivation, and improvement as prescribed by law, has been abandoned and deserted by her husband for a period of more than one year, the deserted wife shall, upon establishing the fact of such abandonment or desertion to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to submit proof upon such claim and obtain patent therefor in her name in the form, manner, and subject to the conditions prescribed in section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof: Provided, That in such cases the wife shall be required to show residence upon, cultivation, and improvement of the homestead by herself for such time as when, added to the time during which her husband prior to desertion had complied with the law, would aggregate the full amount of residence, improvement, and cultivation required by law: And provided further, That the published and posted notices of intention to submit final proof in such cases shall recite the fact that the proof is to be offered and patent sought by applicant as a deserted wife, and a copy of the said notice shall be mailed to the last known address of the husband of applicant.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, lines 15, 16, and 17, strike out the words "and a copy of said notice shall be mailed to the last known address of the husband of the applicant" and insert "and, prior to its submission, notice thereof shall be served upon the husband of the applicant in such a manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California whether anyone has any idea how many of these cases there are? Is it a very common practice in the West for husbands to run away from their wives after making a homestead entry? Is that the usual thing?

Mr. RAKER. No; that is not the usual thing. There are a few cases, as in all other parts of the West, and the various registers and receivers of the various land offices have had experience——

Mr. MANN. Well, is it a very common practice in that section of the country?

Mr. RAKER. I could not say it was a common practice. There are always a few cases of this kind in every locality.

Mr. MANN. Well, I notice that this bill is warmly supported by Mr. John F. Armstrong, register, and Mr. Samuel Butler, receiver, of the land office at Sacramento. Of course, that is included within the general jurisdiction of the gentleman from California. In the letter they make this statement, referring to the troubles between husbands and wives and where wives are left. "Many of them do not know the whereabouts of their derelict spouses." And again the letter says: "And it frequently happens that many of these unfortunate women," and so forth; and again it says: "This office is in receipt of numerous inquiries on this subject." Now, I just wondered if out in the gentleman's section when a man and wife went on a homestead to make an entry it was a general practice, as intimated by the register and receiver, for the husband to run away and leave his wife there?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Butler are the register and the receiver, respectively, at the land office at Sacramento, which is the capital of the State. A number of offices have been abandoned and they have been consolidated into a land office at Sacramento and, of course, they are in a position where they have an opportunity to observe more of these kind of cases than others. I know a number of cases in my part of the country, and they have been pitiful.

Mr. MANN. I judge from what these gentlemen said when they slopped over that it was the usual thing out there, if one can believe them. Now, I notice this letter says, referring to these women:

Many of them do not know the whereabouts of their derelict spouses.

Mr. RAKER. I think that is a true statement.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman does not give those people any relief.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; this gives them relief.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The gentleman is not familiar with his own bill. Let me read the gentleman what his committee has reported:

And prior to its submission notice thereof shall be served upon the husband of the applicant.

Now, how is it possible for the wife, when the husband has run away, to serve a notice upon him, when nobody knows where he is?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman's question, the Land Office rules and regulations provide for publication, which is a service of the notice. Now, the department has suggested an amendment, which is found here, that service be had under the rules and regulations provided for by the Secretary of the Interior. In all contests on homestead matters where the homesteader can not be found the rule provides that publication of notice is sufficient notice to the entryman, and therefore they can proceed.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, where the law provides a publication notice may be made it is sufficient, but where it says you must serve a man you must serve him, and that is what you propose here. It says it shall be served upon the husband of the applicant in such a manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

Mr. RAKER. Let me answer the gentleman upon that.

Mr. MANN. You can not serve a notice upon a man without knowing where he is.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact. The law as it now stands in regard to contests provides that the notice must be served upon the homestead entryman, and then when he can not be found the rules and regulations provide that a service by publication ordered by the register and receiver on affidavit is equivalent to sufficient service. That is the same way with all the court proceedings. And we have used that language, which is the same as is in the law now relative to contests of homestead entries and otherwise.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt if the committee improved this bill by amending it. It seems to me that the law as it is is in better form than it is proposed to make it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To demand the regular order. Mr. Speaker, if we could have facts instead of so much air, that would be better under the circumstances.

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Wyoming——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] withdraw his demand for the regular order?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. When I drew the original bill I put it in as suggested. Now, the department went over it and thought that it would be better to serve notice under the rules and regulations adopted by the Secretary, which would be that where the wife did not know the present whereabouts of the husband an affidavit would be made and filed with the register and receiver, and then upon that affidavit public notice would be given.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman knows that the husband would have the same public notice that anyone else had, and that other than that the notice given to claimant and contestant is a notice in every case, under the law, at the last known address, and there is no reason why you should depart from that universal rule or practice in a case of this sort.

Mr. RAKER. I am willing to put it in either way, because I do not think it makes much difference which way it goes in.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, in answer to the very proper inquiry made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to say that whatever may be the situation in California, in the balance of the public-land States there are not many of these cases; but what few of them have come to my attention have been very meritorious, and the majority will relieve deserted wives and make provisions for them when there is no provision for them now under the law. The cases are few but meritorious.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that this be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, in lines 17, 18, and 19, strike out the following language beginning in line 17: "and a copy of said notice shall be mailed to the last known address of the husband of the applicant," and insert the following: "and, prior to its submission, notice thereof shall be served upon the husband of the applicant and in such a manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe the bill is in better form as it was introduced and that it would be a mistake to adopt the committee amendment. I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, here is a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior; and by the way, I sometimes wonder why, on matters of public policy, we can not get a report from the Secretary of the Interior himself, instead of some one who is a mere Assistant Secretary. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior says:

> Under the proposed bill, the published and posted notice of intention to submit proof must recite that it is to be offered, and patent sought, by the applicant as a deserted wife, and a copy of the notice must be mailed to the husband's last-known address. This does not appear to fully cover the subject, since there will be many cases where personal service of notice on the husband will be feasible, and no justification for constructive notice will exist. It is suggested that there should be a general provision for notice to the husband under such rules as to the method of service as the department may prescribe.

Now, I understood from that, in reading it—although it may not say so, because very seldom are these letters clear that come from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior—that he intended, under the provisions of the bill, that there should be constructive notice, but he thinks there ought to be actual notice, and therefore he suggested the amendment which the committee has offered. Now, do I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to say that under existing law in similar cases the words "constructive notice" are used and authorized?

Mr. RAKER. Under the bill as originally introduced, under the lines stricken out, the practice would be permitted just as the Secretary says, namely, a notice would be posted in the office, stating the description of the land, and when proof was to be had, and service at the last-known address of the deserting husband. That is all that would be necessary. Under the rules that now exist in the department relating to all land matters, where the right of the party is involved, if service can not be had personally, then an affidavit is made, showing want of knowledge of the location of the party, and the register and receiver then orders publication to be had, say, for 30 days, and sometimes for 2 months, and that is then considered to be constructive notice sufficient to permit the land office to proceed and adjudicate the rights, just as it is the practice in our courts to secure constructive service upon a defendant involved in litigation as to the right to property, divorce, or otherwise.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not hold any brief to defend the Department of the Interior, and I do not take it upon myself to do so; but I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would not want to be so severe in his criticism of the department when I call his attention to the fact that during the preceding administration of the Interior Department the practice was almost uniform fo the Assistant Secretary of the Interior to make reports on these bills; not always, of course, and neither is it always in this administration. Samuel Adams, Assistant Secretary under Secretary Fisher, drew and signed nearly all of the reports, as the reports themselves will show. That practice was quite uniform under that administration. It has not been to so great an extent under this administration.

I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have great respect for the preceding Secretary and the preceding Assistant Secretary, and I likewise have the same respect for the present Secretary and the present Assistant Secretary; and if the gentleman should make it so notorious that he would have the Secretary himself sign all of the reports, in all probability the same man would draw the reports, and the result would be the same as if you would carry them in and have a very busy Secretary sign them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have not used anything like as harsh language concerning the present Secretary as I did concerning the former Secretary. I think it is a burning shame that these Secretaries of departments that we create and who are put at the head of the departments shirk the duty of giving information and opinions to Congress and put it on an Assistant Secretary, who says, "I think so-and-so," and nobody knows who he is, while we do know who the head of a department is.

Now, I made a much stronger statement on this subject concerning the last administration than I have made concerning the present one, and I took the matter up at one time with Secretary Fisher, who wrote to me and said, "You are mistaken; I sign more of these reports than you think." I called his attention to more than 30 bills where he had not sent more than two or three of the reports and where Mr. Samuel Adams, Assistant Secretary, had sent all the others. I do not care the snap of the finger for the opinion of the Assistant Secretary, although I value the Secretary's opinion.

Mr. FERRIS. He came from the gentleman's own State.

Mr. MANN. Well, I never knew him, and I would not know him now if I saw him.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, I will say that even if the gentleman from Illinois was wrong in his criticism of the Secretary under the Republican administration, it is no sign he should be wrong in regard to the Secretary under this administration.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the policy of the administration. A clerk down there fixes it. I am opposed to allowing clerks to fix the policy of an administration.

Mr. FERRIS. It is true that the practice has grown up here of allowing departments to say what ought to be done. What Congress is in need of is information furnished by the departments to the legislative branch of the Government, so that Congress can draw its own conclusions. I do not care whether it is a Secretary or an Assistant Secretary who says this or that ought to be done. Congress ought to have something to do with it and something to say about it.

The membership of the Congress has to go out in the country and win its seats. Some one in the department who knows the details ought to furnish an information sheet on each bill, without saying whether they are for it or against it, because Congress does not care so much whether they are for or against it, as it desires accurate information. Of course it is an easy, slack way of doing things to ask how does the department stand and lean on them. That practice is very prevalent around this Capitol, and we of the Congress are to blame for it. The department as a rule does not inflict themselves upon us, but only report on bills when asked to do so. The department's load is not a light one. They do pretty well in every case where I have run them down. Our Interior Department as now constituted is especially strong. Secretary Lane is probably the greatest Secretary the department has had in a generation. I think none has or could work harder or accomplish more.

His First Assistant Secretary Jones is a strong lawyer and a conscientious officer.

I repeat the department as constituted is strong, honest, and on the job. I am proud of them, they are serving the country well.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. My friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says it ought not to make any difference what the opinions of these officers are. I do not think it does make much difference what the opinion of an assistant secretary is, but we have just passed a reclamation bill that was drawn by the Secretary of the Interior. If the gentleman has his way, we are shortly to pass two or three mining bills and land bills proposed by the Secretary of the Interior. It makes a great deal of difference what they think about it. They draw a bill, and that becomes to a large extent the policy of Congress, not always even as a partisan matter, and we ought to have the opinion of the Secretary when it comes to fixing a policy. It is true that we do not have to follow the opinion of the Secretary, but there is no man on the Democratic side of the Public Lands Committee who would vote to report a bill involving a policy without wanting to know in advance the opinion of the Secretary, and properly so if it was an important matter. Now, we have assistant secretaries in various departments giving their opinions. We do not want the opinion of the man, but it is the opinion of the department we want. That opinion of the department is voiced through the Secretary of the Interior, and ought to be.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? Does not the gentleman realize that the heads of these departments are so tremendously busy that they can not possibly prepare or hardly take time to read these opinions or reports on bills?

Mr. MANN. I do not realize any such thing. I know to the contrary.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Secretary of the Interior has something like 18,000 employees under him in the various bureaus, and he can not possibly give his personal attention to all these matters. The First Assistant is a lawyer, the one who does this very work. He is the one who naturally prepares the opinion. It comes from the commissioner first. The law clerks in the commissioner's office take it up first and go through the records; then it comes up to the Secretary's office, to the First Assistant Secretary, and he is the one who finally passes upon the report in detail.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing more important in the duties of the Secretary of the Interior than to give information to Congress. Here we have bills referred by the Committee on the Public Lands, the Committee on Indian Affairs, and so forth, and according to my friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] the Secretary of the Interior spends his time discussing patronage with somebody——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. He ought to be spending his time discussing legislation in Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He has a thousand things on his mind to attend to and very great responsibility.

Mr. MANN. What does he do with all his time? He has 24 hours in the day. There is considerable of that time when he is attending to the public business, and he does no more important public business than when he is sending communications to the great legislative body of the country—to Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the Secretary of the Interior works harder than any other Cabinet official.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is no greater friend of Secretary Lane than I am, and I am hoping I can help to guide him to perform the duties of his office in the way they ought to be performed and to treat Congress with ordinary respect. When I came here there was not a Secretary of any executive department who would permit an Assistant Secretary to write a letter to a Member. The Secretaries themselves always signed communications to Members of Congress; but now it has gotten so that a great committee of the House can not get a communication signed by the Secretary, but it is put on to a clerk to sign it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERRIS) there were—ayes 37, noes 10.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. No debate is allowed on a bill that is up by unanimous consent, is there?

The SPEAKER. There may be debate.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is debate allowed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is this way: When a bill is read, the Speaker asks if there is objection, and gentlemen reserve the right to object, and talk about it; but when the consent is given, then it depends on whether the bill is on the House Calendar or on the Union Calendar. If it is on the Union Calendar and the House goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or if it is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, then it is considered under the five-minute debate; but if it is a House bill, it can be debated as long as the House pleases.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, NEW ORLEANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16172) to give the consent of the Congress to the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near New Orleans, La.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Louisiana, I ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman from Louisiana state that he would like to have it passed without prejudice?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; because he is looking up information about which the gentleman from Illinois raised an objection when it was up the last time.

Mr. MANN. He is not looking up the information; it was sent to him. I supposed he was going to move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FORT BRIDGER MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 92) to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation, in Wyoming.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the lands on the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation in Wyoming are hereby made subject to appropriate entry under the land laws of the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

At the end of the bill add the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to provide any refundment of moneys heretofore paid for lands in the said reservation or to relieve entrymen from payments due or to become due on entries heretofore made."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RESTORATION OF HOMESTEAD RIGHTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15983) to restore homestead rights in certain cases.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

LOCATORS OF OIL AND GAS LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be read instead of the original bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think it all ought to be read.

The Clerk read the bill and committee amendment, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, be amended by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. 2. That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal upon which oil or gas has been discovered, prior to such application for patent, and where there has been no final determination by the Secretary of the Interior upon such applications for patent, said Secretary, in his discretion, may enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe, with such applicants for patents in possession of such land or any portions thereof relative to the disposition of the oil or gas produced therefrom or the proceeds thereof, pending final determination of the title thereto by the Secretary of the Interior, or such other disposition of the same as may be authorized by law."

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT.

Strike out all of the foregoing and insert the following:

"That an act entitled 'An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest,' approved March 2, 1911, be amended by adding thereto the following section:

"'SEC. 2. That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal upon which oil or gas has heretofore been discovered, or is being produced, or upon which drilling operations are in actual progress at the date of the passage of this act, and oil or gas is thereafter discovered thereon, and where there has been no final determination by the Secretary of the Interior upon such applications for patent, said Secretary, in his discretion, may enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe with such applicants for patents in possession of such land or any portions thereof, relative to the disposition of the oil or gas produced therefrom or the proceeds thereof, pending final determination of the title thereto by the Secretary of the Interior, or such other disposition of the same as may be authorized by law.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I understand that the gentleman from California has an amendment which he proposes to offer.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I have two short committee amendments which I propose to offer to this bill. I will send them up and have them read for information. They are amendments to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all after the word "progress" in line 25.

Strike out the following words, page 3, line 1, "passage of this act," and insert in their place the words "on October 3, 1910."

Also, after the words "by law," line 13, page 3, insert the following: "Any money which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be set aside for the needs of the Navy and deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the fund to be known as the 'Navy petroleum fund,' which fund shall be applied to the needs of the Navy as Congress may from time to time direct, by appropriation or otherwise.

The SPEAKER Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the effect of the first amendment is to require that these operations shall have been in progress in 1910.

Mr. CHURCH. The actual drilling must have been in progress at that date.

Mr. MANN. And not down to date?

Mr. CHURCH. Not down to date; that is, from the passage of the bill back to October, 1910. I would say that is an amendment that was suggested by the Navy Department, and after the Public Lands Committee had it under consideration it thought it was wiser to make the amendment.

Mr. MANN. What is the effect of it?

Mr. CHURCH. It simply shortens the time.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by shortening the time?

Mr. CHURCH. I will state that under the original amendment anyone who was actually engaged in boring at the time of the passage of this bill could take advantage of this present bill, and it was thought that that was rather liberal, and that it would give people opportunity, even since this legislation was brought on, to start up boring operations, and so we dated it back within 90 days—the 3d of October in 1910—of the congressional withdrawal.

Mr. MANN. Let us see how it reads, and see whether the gentleman has it in good shape; I know it is not grammatical:

That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order or withdrawal upon which oil or gas has heretofore been discovered—

That is, down to date—

or is being produced—

That is, down to date—

or upon which drilling operations are in actual progress in October, 1910.

Mr. CHURCH. The word "are" should be "were."

Mr. MANN. That is the grammatical error to which I called attention.

Mr. CHURCH. I would be glad to have that corrected.

Mr. MANN. This would still leave this act so that this will give it effect upon any land upon which oil or gas has been heretofore discovered prior to the passage of the act, or on which oil is being produced at the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. CHURCH. As I understand it.

Mr. MANN. But if they were merely drilling operations, without knowledge that oil was there, then those drilling operations must have been in progress in 1910.

Mr. CHURCH. That is the way I understand the act.

Mr. MANN. I do not know. If there is a man on earth who can tell what that means in the end he is a daisy, but I am not going to object.

Mr. CHURCH. I am sure the committee will be very glad to accept any amendment that will clarify it.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what they want. I think the amendments offered make it a good deal better than the original bill. The gentleman wants to put in his amendment a provision changing the word "are," in line 25, to "were."

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California where the first amendment ended on page 3—if it ended at the word "act"?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. That amendment, it seems to me, in order to be harmonious and logical, should strike out all down to and including the word "thereon" in line 2, page 3.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. That would not fit with the other page.

Mr. MONDELL. Then you must change that language as to its grammar. It is not clear what is intended. If the intent is to relate back to a condition of drilling operations at the time of what is known as the congressional withdrawal and including any lands where oil or gas has been heretofore discovered, and not cases where oil or gas is hereafter discovered, then it would be necessary to correct the amendment down to the word "thereon" in line 2. If the gentleman will follow that language:

Where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered—

We have many areas in our State that are affected by this legislation, and I would like to have it in form so that it will afford real relief—

That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal upon which oil or gas has heretofore been discovered, or is being produced, or upon which drilling operations are in actual progress on October 3, 1910, and oil or gas is thereafter discovered thereon.

Mr. CHURCH. That refers to where the drilling operations were enforced.

Mr. MONDELL. What does it mean—thereafter or hereafter, or what?

Mr. CHURCH. After that date—after October 3, 1910.

Mr. MONDELL. Then that is the past tense and it is not the present or future tense.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield? That last subdivision says "upon which drilling operations are in actual progress October 3, 1910, and oil or gas is thereafter discovered thereon," and means that any time after October 3, 1910, but the only condition is that there must be drilling operations on October 3, 1910, and thereafter at any time if they continue in good faith and discover oil or gas, then they come within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps the Secretary could figure it out; I can not.

Mr. MANN. You might strike out "is" and put nothing in its place. What the committee intends, I think, is not quite clear.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes——

Mr. RAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is to strike out "is" in this clause.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHURCH. Now I offer the amendments which have been sent to the Clerk's desk and which have been already read.

Mr. FERRIS. Ask unanimous consent to modify the first one.

Mr. CHURCH. No; the second one.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all after the word "progress" in line 25.

Strike out the following words, page 3, line 1, "passage of this act," and insert in their place the words "on October 3, 1910."

Also, after the words "by law," line 11, page 3, insert the following: "Any money which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be set aside for the needs of the Navy and deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the fund to be known as the 'Navy petroleum fund,' which fund shall be applied to the needs of the Navy as Congress may from time to time direct, by appropriation or otherwise."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on page 2, line 25, where the word "are" appears, the third word in the line, the word "were" be inserted in its place.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "are" and insert the word "were."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "is," page 3, line 1, and insert the word "was."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. The gentleman does not want that word "was." I am satisfied——

Mr. MONDELL. Just let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: This act will be read by the Secretary of the Interior as a continuing act. It must be; it is not an act relating to matters in the past altogether. It relates to conditions that exist in a particular case that comes to him.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call attention to this: Suppose, when this act passes, a man has been in actual operation from the 3d of October, 1910——

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. And he discovers oil after this bill passes, and then proceeds to get a patent. Under this bill they will say, Here we intended to mean you must have discovered oil before this bill became operative.

Now, there is one case that appeared before the committee, and it was a just one, from all the testimony, where the man had spent $350,000 and had a high-class, up-to-date derrick and drilling machinery, and everything upon the field he is working to-day, and was working two months ago, hoping every day to discover oil.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to have this legislation enacted. I do not agree with the view of the gentleman from California, but I think the Secretary of the Interior may be able to understand what the committee meant if we do not change this language; furthermore, the bill goes to conference and can be modified there if it seems necessary, and so I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment in order to avoid delay or a prolonged discussion of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard a moment in opposition to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not offer an amendment, and I shall not oppose the committee amendment, and yet I regret the bill is not in a somewhat different form. I have no very clear idea, and I doubt if the members of the committee, all of them, have a very clear notion, what the Secretary of the Interior would do under the bill in the matter of impounding the product of wells or the receipts from such products. What seems to me he ought to do is to impound such a proportion of the receipts from these wells as would equal a good royalty, and retain that in event final decision as to title is against the claimant. What I fear is that the Secretary of the Interior might feel that, under the language of the bill, he was authorized and that it was his duty to impound the entire receipts.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. And in case of an adverse decision, to retain the entire receipts, which in the case of expensive wells would mean bankruptcy to the claimant. Now, I hope the Secretary does not write that kind of an interpretation into the legislation, and I would like to have the view of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] on that point.

Mr. RAKER. Why, the matter was thrashed out thoroughly before the committee. The officers of the Secretary of the Interior were present, and from the statement of the gentlemen from California who were here when the legislation was under consideration, it was understood that the condition was such that these men could not now sell their oil because——

Mr. MONDELL. I understand those conditions.

Mr. RAKER. But on that very proposition; and that the Secretary of the Interior, under this bill, would retain what would be a fair royalty in proportion to the amount of money that had been expended, and holding that until a final determination was had. Then, if the Government wins, it takes that proportion of the oil, and it goes into that fund, and if it is not in these two reserves, goes into the fund provided for by law.

Mr. MONDELL. This is an important matter, and I will say to my friend from California that two different people have written me in regard to it, asking me the same question—as to what portion of the receipts the Secretary is to impound. So the doubt does arise in the mind of one reading the bill whether it was anticipated under any circumstances that the Secretary could impound the entire receipts of a well and hold them, provided the case was against the entryman. That would be a gross injustice.

Mr. RAKER. It was intended that he could not do it.

Mr. FERRIS. I think there is no question he has the power to do it, and I think there is no question but that he ought to have the power to do it, but I do not think he has any intention of doing it.

Mr. MONDELL. Then you think he could retain the entire surplus?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think there is any question about it; and even so, it would be better than it is now. The gentleman was the chairman of the committee and knows about these things, and I think the judgment of the commissioner ought to be considered sufficient, and it read to me as if it were sufficient. But the Land Department does not so hold. These gentlemen have courageously spent their money in the oil wells of the West. They are tied up, and they will be ruined unless you do something for them. This bill makes a working arrangement where the Secretary of the Interior can reserve the rights of the Federal Government and permit them to go forward.

Mr. MONDELL. I am in accord with the gentleman. I simply wanted it to be understoood that the interpretation of the committee was that there was to be impounded an amount that would be equivalent to a fair royalty in these cases. I only wish I could prevail on the House to accept an amendment that would make it clear that only a fair royalty could be retained.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, it is not ordinarily a good thing to talk after your case is won, and I know that is a good rule to follow, but I want to say a word in the face of things that have been said here. It is said the bill is meaningless to our understanding. This bill was put up to the Interior Department, next to the Navy Department, and next to the Department of Justice, and next to the commissioner, and it has run the gantlet of the committee and the gantlet of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has gone over it. The bill is intelligible, and the department will know what to do under it, and in conjunction with the three orders—two Executive orders and the one known as the Pickett bill—the bill will accomplish what is desired.

Mr. BELL of California. May I ask if this bill is satisfactory to a number of gentlemen who came on and who are directly interested?

Mr. FERRIS. It is; and it is their burning desire to get it through, and if it goes through it will help them wonderfully.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHURCH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker:

Never stoops the soaring vulture
On his quarry in the desert,
On the sick or wounded bison,
But another vulture, watching
From his high aerial lookout,
Sees the downward plunge, and follows;
And a third pursues the second,
Coming from the invisible ether,
First a speck, and then a vulture,
Till the air is dark with pinions.
So disasters come not singly;
But as if they watched and waited,
Scanning one another's motions,
When the first descends, the others
Follow, follow, gathering flockwise
Round their victim, sick and wounded,
First a shadow, then a sorrow,
Till the air is dark with anguish.

The oil producers of California have had demonstrated to their hearts' content that "disaster comes not singly," for since the presidential withdrawal of September, 1909, the very air to them has been dark with anguish. Embraced within this withdrawn territory were many oil-producing wells for which patents had not yet been received; also several thousand acres on which locations in good faith had been made and boring and other development work were in actual progress. This condition, of course, was not contemplated or foreseen by the President when he made the withdrawal; nevertheless it closed all such oil wells, stopped all development, and spread consternation in the minds of those whose interests were thus involved. A number of operators and developers thus affected, who were financially able, started on what has proved to be an oft-repeated pilgrimage to Washington. Their purpose was to have corrected, if possible, the wrong which had been done them.

After the delegation had lobbied in Washington for four or five months they had the pleasure of seeing, on the 25th of June, 1910, what is known as the Pickett bill approved by the President of the United States. This bill gave them adequate protection along the present line of attack, and provided—

That the rights of any person who, at the date of any order of withdrawal heretofore or hereafter made, is a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas bearing lands, and who at such date is in diligent prosecution of work leading to the discovery of oil or gas, shall not be affected or impaired by such order so long as such occupant or claimant shall continue in the diligent prosecution of said work.

Thus through the energy, intelligence, and self-sacrifice of the oil operators the relief law was passed, the wrong was in a belated manner corrected, and the oil men for a time escaped financial ruin.

The committee returned to the West, located their wives and children, gathered up the fragments of their broken business, opened up the old wells, and resumed development work again.

But no sooner had they replenished their pocketbooks, depleted by the expense and tips of travel, than another vulture of trouble, coming from a clear sky, pounced upon them. It did not first appear, however, in the form of a "speck," as in the poem, but came with all the hideous outlines of sure destruction. The trouble was simply this: The Interior Department made a rule that the transfer of an oil claim was void, as far as passing title is concerned, unless prior thereto an actual discovery of oil had been made. This decision turned upside down all past theories and procedure and left the oil fields of the West in a hopeless and helpless condition. This decision, if it remained the law, meant the destruction and confiscation of the fortunes of thousands of people who had purchased land in the best of faith, buying, possibly, from parties who, after locating it in good faith and spending from twenty thousand to a hundred thousand dollars in the search for oil, were compelled to sell by reason of the fact that their available money was entirely gone. The present holders, whose titles were thus declared worthless, had spent in some instances hundreds of thousands of dollars and finally had been rewarded by the discovery of oil in large and paying quantities.

Be it remembered, the predicament in which the oil operators thus again found themselves was not their fault, but was caused through the gross negligence of the Government in not having laws applicable to the discovery of oil. There being no such laws, the prospector for oil was obliged to conform to the placer-mining law, which was only meant to apply to the discovery of gold, which provided first for a discovery, then the filing of a location notice, and last the performance of $100 worth of work each year in order to hold the claim. The discovery of oil before a legal claim to the land can be established is an impossibility, for the reason that oil is found from 2,000 to 4,000 feet underground instead of at the grass roots as in the case of gold, and an expense of from $20,000 to $100,000 is usually incurred in sinking the well before the discovery is made.

With this view of the situation it is clear the decision of the department rendered null and void nine out of ten of all of the claims in the various fields, owing to the fact that at least that per cent of the claims had been transferred by the original locator before the discovery of oil, it being generally the case that the fortune of the original locator was not great enough to bore a well of sufficient depth, after expending four or five thousand dollars for a derrick and drilling outfit. One can well imagine the plight of the purchaser who had reimbursed the locator for his time and money and had gone on with a multiplied expense as he went farther down, and after reaching his goal woke up to the fact that because of the transfer by the original locator he had no title, and that his well was located on withdrawn Government land.

What was to be done—another trip to Washington to correct a mistake made by the oil operator? No, but to correct a mistake made by the Government in not providing the operator with adequate and appropriate laws.

So the committee journeyed 3,500 miles across the continent to do lobbying again at the Capitol. And let me say right here, I believe that lobbying is necessary. We have little enough real information in regard to the subject matter of these far-reaching laws that we pass. I am persuaded that most of us are half clad with knowledge on many of the great subjects about which we legislate, and for one I like to have the persons most interested come to me and talk and give me facts and figures and reasons why. It is frequently through the activity of persons most interested that wrong conditions are corrected and oppressive laws repealed. I do not think our cup of knowledge is apt to become too full. I do not think the laws we pass are always right and just. I wish the Californians had done more lobbying before the passage of the late tariff law. I wish the great committee had been better supplied with knowledge in regard to some of the great western industries before they spoke. Shortsighted as we are, we never see too far. Dull of comprehension, our cup of information is never full. I do not believe in the infallibility of political parties any more than I do in the infallibility of men. I believe in the Democratic Party because it is nearly always right; but if I had the writing of the next Democratic national platform I would leave the time-worn tariff plank completely out, not because our views are wrong but because no political party should hold the destiny of all the business interests in this country in its hand. It causes instability, financial uncertainty, and unrest. It paralyzes business of all kinds during general election times. Generally men are politicians, not statesmen, when they first come as Representatives to Washington. Little do they know and little opportunity have they had to know the details of the complex tariff schedules and general bewildering tariff law. The majority of us would have to employ five years or more of constant study before we would be well enough informed to cast a real intelligent vote.

I want to see this matter in the future handled in a business way by a nonpartisan commission, composed of the wisest and all-around biggest men this country can produce, and have them serve during good behavior for a long period of years. Pay them an annual salary sufficient to guarantee the best business brains that can possibly be found, and let them, without fear or favor, dig and work the matter out.

But I have wandered from the subject of oil. What did the committee do on this second trip to Washington? They remained for several months, and finally had the situation satisfactorily cleared up by seeing the Smith bill approved by the President on the 2d of March, 1911, which provides:

That in no case shall patent be denied to or for any lands heretofore located or claimed under the mining laws of the United States containing petroleum, mineral oil, or gas solely because of any transfer or assignment thereof or of any interest or interests therein by the original locator or locators, or any of them, to any qualified person or persons or corporation prior to discovery of oil or gas therein; but if such claim is in all other respects valid and regular, patent therefor, not exceeding 160 acres in any one claim, shall issue to the holder or holders thereof as in other cases: Provided, however, That such lands were not at the time of inception of development on or under such claim withdrawn from mineral entry.

And thus again the vultures were driven from the sky and again the oil operators began to breathe the air of content.

But, alas, little did they know what the future had in store. Detectives clad with gum shoes were quietly working in their midst, and it was soon discovered that in originally locating these oil lands some locators had used the names of parties who really were not interested in the land. In other words, in following the placer-mining law in locating 160 acres by the joint effort of eight, some of the eight in some instances were uncles, cousins, or aunts, who really did not know or care a rap about the claim.

Two or three suits were brought—properly, I do not doubt—against parties holding such claims, the theory being the claims were not legally located. In these suits those who had purchased the oil taken from such land in question were also made codefendants. As a result of this last act the oil fields were again thrown into utter and hopeless confusion. These new oil fields have entailed an overwhelming amount of work on the Interior Department, and it is several years behind in passing upon the application for patents, and as a result hundreds have not applied for patents who otherwise would have, and hundreds who have applied have not had the matter settled in the Interior Department, and as a result about half of the claims and oil wells in these western fields are held and operated under the original claim, the owner not having yet received his patents. The result of making the oil purchasers codefendants caused oil buyers to cease to purchase oil from any of these lands to which a patent has not yet been issued, the prospective purchaser not knowing, as long as the patent had not been issued, but that the Government might some time in the future institute suit against the holder of the well and make him, in case he bought the oil, a codefendant in the suit. This fear has worked like a temporary injunction to prevent any further sale of oil on lands to which a patent has not yet been granted.

And so the last state of the oil men is worse than the first.

What could they do? Another trip to Washington! And so the committee came again and have been here six months or more. They have appeared before the Public Lands Committee on several occasions, and I have worked out, with the aid of the committee, two bills calculated to give to them the much-needed relief. The one we are now considering, Senate bill 5673, companion to House bill 15469, provides that the Secretary of the Interior may enter into an agreement with all parties who have not yet received a patent, pending their application for the same, whereby they may sell their oil, the Secretary holding enough of the same so the Government will be safe in case the patent application is finally not allowed.

This plan enables the operator to open up his now closed wells and start his rusty machinery and begin to work and live again. No one can lose anything by the passage of this bill. Its passage is necessary in order to relieve an intolerable situation which, as in the case of all the other calamities which have befallen the oil operators of my district, was brought on not through the fault of the oil men but through the act of the Government.

House bill 15661, which will come up and pass, I hope, in the near future, is another relief measure which has been reported favorably by our committee. It in substance provides that any person who has an oil well but as yet has not received a patent for his claim, may, if he sees fit, surrender his right for a patent and take a lease from the Government with the understanding that the Government is not to receive more than an eighth royalty of the oil produced. There is no legitimate argument that can be urged against the passage also of this bill. Before the operator can take advantage of its provisions he must have bored a well and discovered oil, the very thing the Government is encouraging everywhere.

Gentlemen, the oil operators in the West do not deserve the treatment they have received. The obstacles which nature has placed in their way are quite enough. Their oil fields are located in a desolate and forbidden land, on a desert bleak and bare, where nothing but sagebrush grows, and the oil man's derrick is all that can be seen to interrupt the wailing, lonesome winds. Drinking water is many miles away, and in summer time the sun's rays can scarcely be endured. At the start there were no railroad nor wagon roads nor transportation lines. The oil is deep, often hidden beneath 4,000 feet of earth and rock.

The men for whom I speak have redeemed this land. Their energy, money, and pluck have made it rich. The natural obstacles have been cast aside as men of straw, but the legal entanglements have perplexed and vexed them sore. Their cause is just, unquestioned as far as I know by any honest, thoughtful man. The passage of these bills will clear up the situation and enable the operators to feel their labors have not altogether been in vain. I sincerely trust the gentlemen of this House, realizing the embarrassing situation under which my constituents have been placed, will freely grant the relief which is so necessary and so much desired.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ADDITIONAL LAND FOR PUBLIC BUILDING, RICHMOND, VA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11822) to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in his discretion, to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, the remainder of the block bounded by Main, Tenth, Eleventh, and Bank Streets, in which the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Commonwealth of Virginia, is located, at a cost not exceeding $600,000.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "exceeding," strike out the figures "$600,000" and insert "$450,000," and add the following proviso: "Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the public interest would be better served by acquiring said property than by acquiring another site for additional post-office facilities."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "exceeding," strike out "$600,000" and insert "$450,000," and add the following proviso: "Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the public interest would be better served by acquiring said property than by acquiring another site for additional post-office facilities."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONTAGUE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FORT HAYS MILITARY RESERVATION, KANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14155) to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park."

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park," be, and the same is, amended to read as follows:

"That the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation and all the improvements thereon, situated in the State of Kansas, be, and the same are hereby, granted to said State upon the conditions that said State shall establish and maintain perpetually thereon, first, an experiment station of the Kansas Agricultural College or a State agricultural college and experimental station; second, a western branch of the Kansas State Normal School or a State normal school, and that in connection therewith the said reservation shall be used and maintained as a public park: Provided, That said State shall, within five years from and after the passage of this act, accept this grant, and shall by proper legislative action establish on said reservation an experiment station of the Kansas Agricultural College or a State agricultural college and experimental station, and a western branch of the State Normal School or a State normal school; and whenever the lands shall cease to be used by said State for the purpose herein mentioned the same shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any tract or tracts within the limits of said reservation to which a valid claim has attached, by settlement or otherwise, under any of the public-land laws of the United States.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill, line 1, page 3, the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to entitle the State of Kansas to any additional appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of the bill, line 1, page 3, the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to entitle the State of Kansas to any additional appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CONNELLY], who is the author of this bill, whether this does any more than change the present authority from a branch of a normal school to a State normal school? I will ask the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois, the bill simply makes this grant to a branch for an independent institution for an agricultural school. The object of the bill is to establish an independent school at Hayes City. Heretofore there have been some branch schools in the State, and a year or two ago the policy was adopted of making these schools independent instead of branches in the State, and it was necessary in order to carry out that policy to get this grant made to the independent schools as well as to the branch, as provided in the original act.

The sole purpose is to give the authority to establish an independent school.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MURDOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MALAMBO FIRE CLAIMANTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12060) to enable the Secretary of War to pay the amount awarded to the Malambo fire claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill will be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BANGOR, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3176) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me., be, and the same is hereby, increased $40,000, and the building shall be so constructed that all of its exterior facades shall be faced with stone.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. GUERNSEY. I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GUERNSEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of no quorum for the present.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 4, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, August 3, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator begins his remarks I believe the Senate ought to have a quorum present, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Gronna	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Newlands	Stone
Bristow	Johnson	Norris	Sutherland
Burton	Jones	O'Gorman	Swanson
Camden	Kenyon	Overman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Page	Thompson
Chilton	Lane	Perkins	Thornton
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Pomerene	Vardaman
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Reed	Walsh
Colt	McCumber	Saulsbury	West
Culberson	McLean	Shafroth	White
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Sheppard
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.

Mr. PAGE. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN], who is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

I was also requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], who is paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] and to state that he is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent on account of illness. This announcement will stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, last night I introduced an amendment to the pending bill, as follows:

On page 15, at the end of line 3, after the word "each," insert:

> And no person who is or has been a member of the commission shall be eligible for any other office under the United States until after a period of one year from the time he ceases to be a commissioner.

That is a committee amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That amendment is acceptable to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I ask for a vote upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the amendment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Senator had yielded the floor on this amendment. We can not take a vote while a Member occupies the floor.

Mr. LIPPITT. I offered the amendment, and it was accepted by the committee. I do not know what the technical situation about it is. The Senator from Texas wants the floor?

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to suggest an amendment to the amendment—before the word "office" to insert the word "statutory."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CULBERSON. So that the amendment would not apply to offices where the Constitution names the qualifications.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think the Senator from Rhode Island had better accept it.

Mr. LIPPITT. To what offices would it apply?

Mr. CULBERSON. The purpose of the amendment would be to exclude Senators and Representatives, because they are constitutional officers. Their qualifications in my judgment are fixed by the Constitution and are beyond the reach of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, an amendment is being discussed that at least one Senator has not the least knowledge of. I wish that it might be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will reread the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Rhode Island offers the following amendment to the proposed substitute of the committee:

> On page 15, line 3, after the word "each" and the period, at the end of the line, insert:
> "And no person who is or has been a member of the commission shall be eligible for any other office under the United States until after a period of one year from the time he ceases to be a commissioner."

To that proposed amendment the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] offers the following:

> Before the word "office" insert the word "statutory," so that if amended it will read:
> "And no person who is or has been a member of the commission shall be eligible for any other statutory office under the United States," etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment was to relieve as far as possible the members of this commission from being in a position where they would be suspected of being not entirely fair in their proceedings by the possession of any ambition or desire to occupy a political office. One point I had in my mind was that they should not be candidates for Representative and Senator or for any other elective office before the people. It is of the greatest importance to the establishing of the confidence of the people in the impartiality of their judgment, their decisions and actions, that they should be free from any taint of political ambition in connection with it.

So far as the legal aspect of this matter goes, of course I am not competent to pass upon it. If it is unconstitutional to make such a provision as this amendment calls for, to apply to such officers as Representatives and Senators, of course it is useless for us to pass the amendment in a form that would do that. But when the subject was under discussion by the committee on two or three occasions I was informed by men of high standing in the legal profession that it did not conflict with any constitutional provision. If it does not conflict with a constitutional provision, I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be favorably acted upon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, as I understand the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, it is, among other things, to render ineligible any member of this commission to the office of Member of Congress in either branch. I am very much in sympathy with the purpose which the Senator from Rhode Island has in view. I think if we have the power to impose such a limitation it would be a very wholesome provision. But I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that the Federal Constitution prescribes the qualifications of Members of Congress—that a Member of the House shall be of a certain age and a resident of the State for a certain number of years—and there is the same sort of a provision with reference to a Member of the Senate. It has been repeatedly held in the Senate, and I think in the House, but I know in the Senate, that there is no power to superadd to those constitutional qualifications, if for no other reason, because there is another provision of the Constitution which provides that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

Each House being the judge, and that would mean of course the sole judge, Congress is powerless to pass a law which would in any manner interfere with that authority upon the part of each House.

In other words, if we passed a law of this kind, and notwithstanding it a member of this commission were elected to the Senate, the Senate under the constitutional provision which makes it the sole judge could simply disregard the congressional law.

That question has arisen in a number of election cases that have come up from time to time in the Senate, and the proposition which I am stating, I think, can not be doubted.

Therefore, while I am in entire sympathy with the Senator's proposition, if we have the power to pass it, because I take that view of it, I should feel constrained to vote against it in the terms in which the Senator presents it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. If I may be allowed, I understand the Senator from Utah thinks that the amendment the Senator from Texas suggests, introducing the word "statutory," would cover that ground.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undoubtedly it would take from the amendment the objection which I have suggested. Whether or not it would then limit it to such an extent as to be practically of no consequence is another question.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, admitting, as I think we all do, that Congress has no authority to fix limitations or qualifications for the position or office of Senator or Representative, nevertheless would it not be a good thing to place this provision in the bill just as it is offered by the Senator from Rhode Island? The very most that its operation could do would be to deter an officer who has accepted a position under the provisions of the law from voluntarily becoming a candidate for the office of Senator or Representative. As a matter of course, if, despite the law which admonishes him against accepting such a position, he nevertheless would become a candidate and be elected, the law which we have passed would not, of course, unseat him or prevent him from taking the oath of office and serving.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that there are many persons who would accept a position under a law of this kind which, while it could not legally prevent a man from becoming a candidate, would in effect indicate to him that the law was passed with the idea and that he has been appointed with the idea that he shall not become a candidate for either of these positions. Certainly it would not make the entire law unconstitutional. The very most that could be claimed for it would be that it would be ineffective if one of these officers desired to become a candidate. Therefore I hope, even though it would not be effective against the officer, for its good effect upon the service which he is to perform, that the amendment may go through as proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. REED. Has the Senator from Rhode Island yielded the floor, or is he on his feet to make a speech?

Mr. LIPPITT. I was going on to make some remarks about the bill, but this amendment has been brought up, and I presume that I do not retain the floor under the circumstances. So I yield the floor for the consideration of the amendment, and intend, after the amendment is disposed of, with the consent of the Senate, to make a few remarks on the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion regarding this proposition. With the purpose of the author I have no quarrel. If it is desired to place this board in a position where it is entirely above and beyond influence, isolated from all of those things which usually affect human beings, and if that can be accomplished by the amendment, well and good; but it seems to me that the amendment will have just the opposite effect from that which is intended by its author.

What do we propose to do? We propose to say to the members of this commission, "You can not accept any public office after you have served upon this commission until one year's time has elapsed; we bar you from seeking honors or profits from the public." Therefore we cut off every incentive to serve the public, and to serve the public so well that the public might desire to reward by further honors the individual holding the office.

There are two opposing forces working constantly on a commission of this kind. One is the great public, desiring its rights protected; the other is the trust, the combination, the gentleman who is restraining trade, the individual who has, as we think, made this commission a necessity under our system of government. You can not cut that influence off. You can say to these men, "No matter how well you do by the public, no matter how thoroughly you protect the public interest, you can not have any public office"; but you can not say to them, "If you serve well the interests that have to be brought before this tribunal and decide questions in their favor, you can not take employment from them." As long as the employment is open and the temptation is present, springing from the great interests that will have their cases before this board, I think we ought to leave also open to these men the chance for popular favor and popular advancement; and I think the people, when they come to an election, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], are fully capable of taking care of their business.

It seems to me utterly wrong to say to a member of that board, "You can not obtain political favor or advancement," and leave the question open for favor and advancement from the opposing interests, to wit, the great trusts and combinations.

Mark you, the evil that we have had illustrations of in this country, and which led to a clause being written into the banking and currency act, was not an evil arising from the public advancement of these men, but from the advancement by the great financial interests of men who had held public office. It grew almost into a scandal here that men who held certain positions in the Treasury Department would be taken from those positions at a higher salary and placed in great banks and trust companies; and the suspicion arose that men might be tempted by the offer of such positions to modify their judgments while in official positions. Consequently we sought to prohibit that. Now, we turn around and say, under this bill, "You shall not have any public position, but the temptation which has been the occasion of restrictive legislation along this line will still exist. You can serve the public never so well upon this commission, but you can not have a public office and the public can not advance you, no matter how necessary you may be. Nevertheless, you can leave this commission at any hour and go to work for the interests that have had litigation before the commission."

Of course, I would like to take the view that men would not be swerved by either motive, but if we are to deal with them as though they would be swerved by such methods, then, certainly, we ought not to cut off the opportunity to public advancement while we leave open the door for private emolument and profit.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] so concisely points out is true, that the members of this commission will be subject to influences of various kinds; it is true that they may be subject to influences of bribery, which may take the form either of dollars and cents or some important position in connection with private affairs. We want to guard against that in every way that it is possible to guard against it. I raise no objection to that position at all. I would surround this commission with every safeguard of which I could think to prevent them being subjected to any influence, public or private.

The fact is that the members of this commission are going to be in a peculiar position, because they are, in the first place, going to have the duty and power of investigating and collecting material upon which to bring charges against people in this country, and after they have collected that evidence they then begin to act in their judicial capacity and themselves pass upon the weight of that evidence.

Their power is greater, therefore, in this respect than the power of the courts or the power of the Attorney General; and, in a peculiar way, the necessity arises for taking every step that we can take to remove them not only from the danger of being actuated by improper motives, but from the suspicion of improper motives on the part of the public at large. The proper performance of the duties of this commission will depend very largely upon their having the confidence of the public.

There are laws against bribery; and although sometimes they are very difficult to enforce, still they exist. It did seem to me that it would be eminently proper, in putting into the hands of this commission the enormous and unparalleled powers we propose to give them, to see if some precautionary steps might not be taken, at least, to indicate to them that in accepting a position on the commission they set themselves apart, so far as it is possible for human nature to set itself apart, from the ordinary influences that govern the actions of private individuals in such a way as sometimes to make them partial and prejudiced and unfair; to insure that these men in reaching their conclusions shall render verdicts based on the facts of the case alone, uninfluenced by any desire to secure a reward of any kind for themselves.

The Senator from Missouri well knows that there are frequently times of popular excitement in this country when the people, uninformed perhaps of the real status of the case, think they want something which a short time afterwards they are very glad they failed to get. Sectional influences may have their effect in connection with such matters. It is not necessary for me to detail them to so astute a mind as that of the Senator from Missouri; but, as I think, Mr. President, it is a very wise thing to try to eliminate from this commission every suspicion of unfairness that we can.

That was all the motive I had in suggesting the amendment. I will be glad to support any amendment which the Senator from Missouri can think of that will make it difficult for the members of this commission to be subject to the influence of any private individual. I have no quarrel with him on that ground.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, if the suggestion embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island were made general law, it would be far less offensive than it is in its present shape, when it is directed to officials provided for in a pending piece of legislation. If the Senator from Rhode Island believes that public confidence in the commission will be promoted by his suggestion, I think he is likely to be disappointed. How can we promote or invite public confidence in the integrity of public officials when in the particular act of their creation we indicate great doubt as to the integrity which will mark their performance of official actions?

We say they are unworthy to hold or will not be permitted to hold office for a particular period after the termination of their immediate employment.

It is believed that the safeguards furnished by the Constitution are ample to insure the selection of worthy and proper citizens for the discharge of public duties. It is to be assumed that the President in naming these commissioners will first satisfy himself that they are capable; that they are honest; that they are faithful to the Constitution; and it should be equally assumed that when those nominations come into the Senate, before they are confirmed, Senators will satisfy themselves that the persons so selected by the President are honest, capable, and faithful to the Constitution.

Of course, there have been times in the past when the expectations regarding public officials have been disappointed, but we have a remedy in the Constitution. Where men are faithless to their trust, they may be impeached and removed; and why, in addition to these safeguards, should we attempt to impose upon these particular officials this manifestation of our avowed doubt of their integrity, their fairness, and their devotion to the public?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, in answer to that question, I will say that we are not imposing upon the members of the commission a condition that implies doubt of their integrity; but we are giving to them the reason why we should surround them with greater safeguards, which is that we are intrusting to them greater power than we have ever intrusted to any other men in the country.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator think that they will possess greater powers than are now confided to the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do, for this reason: These men are first put in a position where they collect the evidence and then they may bring charges. Having by the authority of the law been put in that position, they then turn around and are put in the position of judging of the integrity of the very evidence that they themselves have collected. That is an extraordinary position to put men in; and under such circumstances the Senator from New York, as much as anybody in this country, wants to uphold the integrity and the fair reputation of these judges or these quasi judges—if I may call these commissioners such.

That is all that I am trying to do. I do not think that by merely suggesting in this amendment one form of temptation which may come before them, and trying to remove that temptation, we are doing anything to imply any distrust of the integrity of the members of the commission.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, it is distinctly avowed here on the floor of the Senate by the proponents of this suggestion that this is intended to restrain those infirmities to which, perhaps, the best of men may at some time be exposed when under temptation. The point that I desire to make is that if we have reached a time in this country when we can not with perfect confidence select worthy, honest, and capable men for the discharge of any public duty without imposing such further restraints as are expressed in this proposition, then we have reached an unhappy day in the life of the Republic.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, Mr. President, that is, perhaps, true; but in legislation now pending we are trying to remove from the field of temptation men who are honorable and of high integrity. We are saying that a man shall occupy but one directorship, because, however great his integrity may be, as it has been expressed, it is impossible for a man to serve two masters; that in two directorships he can not be fair to both sides. I personally do not quite agree with that. Nevertheless, the whole purpose, the whole process, of the law is to surround men with barriers over which they are not intended to pass; to say to them, "Within this sphere is the ground of your duties, and you must not go outside of it."

Certainly, Mr. President, whatever we can do to make these men have the sole ambition of performing well the duties of this office, and look to no other reward except the reward of the verdict of the public of "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," is greatly to be desired.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does not the Senator from Rhode Island recognize, as pointed out by the junior Senator from Missouri, that by his proposal he is not only excluding these men from public approbation, but he is holding wide the opportunity of preference through private enterprises?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I shall be delighted to have the Senator from New York suggest some further amendment to the bill that will remove these men from the possibility of being overpersuaded by any private inducement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator recognizes that that is a defect in his proposal?

Mr. LIPPITT. But the fact that in one little amendment we can not cover all the ground of temptation is no reason for not covering the ground we can cover. If there is any law needed to prevent bribery, to prevent undue influence on the part of great interests or of small interests, and the Senator will formulate the language by which that is to be accomplished, I have no doubt I shall be glad to vote for it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Congress of the United States can not prohibit a citizen from entering private employment after he leaves public employment, unless it be with respect to those matters, such as national banks, which are under congressional control because they operate through congressional permission and action; so it is impossible to remedy the Senator's proposal in the way indicated.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was aware of that, Mr. President, or I should have enlarged this amendment so as to include some such thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, which reads as follows:

> And no person who is or has been a member of the commission shall be eligible for any other office under the United States—

And so forth, the Senator from Texas proposes, before the word "office," to insert "statutory," so that it will read "any other statutory office."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it strikes me the amendment is unnecessary. I realize that the powers given to this board are very great, and that the benefit which the public shall derive from this law will depend entirely upon the administration of it. It is a case where, as expressed by Pope—

> For forms of law let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administered is best.

I think we can very well afford to leave the settlement of this matter to the people of the country. I do not think all the wisdom and all the patriotism is bottled up in the Senate. I think the American people can be trusted to make their own selection; and if a man, in the performance of the function of that place, has done his duty well, has shown himself fit for official station, there is no reason why he should not be called to serve the people in some other capacity.

As said by the junior Senator from Missouri, if a man is prohibited from taking employment at the hands of the people as a reward for service well rendered, you can not by any law prohibit him from taking employment from a corporation that he may have served there. If you could do that, you could say that he should not be employed by anybody. Then there would be nothing left for the man to do except to go to the poorhouse, to the lunatic asylum, to the penitentiary, or somewhere else. He would be entirely debarred from taking employment at all. With all due respect to the proponents of the measure, it is absurd.

I repeat, we can well afford to leave this matter to the common sense, the patriotism, the honesty, and the good judgment of the American voter. It is useless to try to tie a man who is inherently dishonest. If he can be bribed with the hope of office, he can be bribed with money; and as you can not prohibit him from taking employment with a corporation which he may serve in the capacity of commissioner, I think it is futile, it is unnecessary, to say that he should not be employed by the people, if he has shown himself to be capable and worthy of their confidence and they want him for further service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, in saying what I did a few moments ago with reference to this matter I spoke merely from my recollection. Since then I have sent for the first volume of Watson on the Constitution, in which this subject is discussed. At page 157 he discusses the question as to the power of the State to add to the qualifications of Members of Congress, and calls attention to numerous authorities which hold that that can not be done. At page 160 he says:

> If a State could require a candidate for Congress to have additional qualifications to those prescribed by the Constitution, its power would be equal to that of the Constitution, and it could add any additional qualifications it chose.

I think the same statement would apply to an act of Congress. If Congress could superadd to the qualifications, it would then possess a power equal to that of the Constitution, and, indeed, would possess a power practically to amend the Constitution.

Further on, however, this general statement is made, being a quotation from the case of Thomas v. Owens (4 Md., 23), and that states this general rule:

> When a constitution defines the qualification of an officer, it is not within the power of the legislature to change or superadd to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, in the light of what the Senator from Utah has said and the authority that he quoted, I will accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. As modified, does the amendment leave the officer or member open to receive an appointive office? I am asking the author of the amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. I beg pardon; I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. BRISTOW. The amendment as it reads now, as I understand, provides that a member of this commission shall not be eligible to hold a statutory office.

Mr. CULBERSON. That means any office which is created by a statute, in contradistinction to the Constitution.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think he ought to be permitted to be elected to any office to which the people want to elect him, but I do not believe he ought to be eligible to be appointed and transferred from one office to another, because that gives the executive branch of the Government authority to influence his decision through the hope of promotion. I am perfectly willing for him to be promoted by the people of the United States whenever they want to promote him at an election, but I do not want advancement by appointment to be held open to men in order to influence their action as public officials.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I trust he will not take the question as offensive, for it is not so meant. If he was the proprietor of a trust and knew that he was likely to be called before this board at any time, would he not like to have a provision in the law which prohibited members of the board from ever holding public office and left it entirely open for members of the board to take employment from his trust? Does not the Senator think that a trust interest that expected to be called before this board would be the very interest that would want to have the members of the board deprived of any chance for public office or public honors rather than that that cry should come from the people who are supposed to be protected?

Mr. BRISTOW. My observation is that a trust, when it wants to get its friends in public office, does it through the Executive. I cite the Interstate Commerce Commission as it is now constituted, referring to the last appointee, and incidentally to his decision in regard to the rate case the other day.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I would propose to change the amendment that says "for one year after the expiration of his appointment," so as to make the appointee ineligible to hold office during the term for which he was appointed. That principle is embodied in the organic law of many of the States of this Union. It seems to me that would be sufficient, and it would occasion no reflection on the great men who are appointed to this office. Besides, it would keep these men, after they have become efficient in this office, in there during the term, and they would not be seeking some higher elevation in other positions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate to just one illustration. I do not want to prolong this debate; but if this rule is good as to this commission, it ought to be good as to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Suppose we had had such a rule about the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Lane could not have been appointed to his present position. Has the country been wronged in any way by that appointment? I think not. Suppose we organize this board, and we develop upon it some master mind, and he could be of great use upon the bench, do you propose to say he shall not be advanced upon the bench? Why, even with all the safeguards we have thrown around our courts we have never denied the judges the right of being advanced.

It seems to me that this amendment is exactly the wrong thing. At the risk of repetition let me say that there are two influences that probably are at work on every man who holds a public position. I do not mean that the influences are directly asserted, but they exist. Applying the statement particularly to this board, one of those influences would be the great combinations and great trusts brought before the board. The other is the general influence of the public. Now, if I were a trust magnate I would want the influence of the public absolutely cut off. I would want to fix it so that no man upon this board could ever hold another public office. I would want to fix it so that if he ever got any reward in the world he would have to get it through some other source than public favor or public confidence. Then I would want to have the door wide open, so that as he sat and looked out upon the world and saw his term of office expiring he would see no place where he could hope to get employment or make a livelihood except to go to work for me.

That is the situation that is presented here. Why should not a man who serves well and faithfully upon this board be advanced to office, become a Member of Congress, be appointed to the bench, or become a member of the Cabinet? We surely can trust something to the public conscience in matters of this kind.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission I will state that with the consent of the author of the amendment I ask that it be referred back to the committee.

Mr. REED. That course is satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by I. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3176) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 92. An act to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation in Wyoming;

H. R. 1818. An act to regulate the interstate transportation of immature calves;

H. R. 11822. An act to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va.;

H. R. 14155. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park";

H. R. 16296. An act to provide for issuing of patents for public lands claimed under the homestead laws by deserted wives; and

H. R. 18202. An act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 92. An act to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation, in Wyoming;

H. R. 14155. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park"; and

H. R. 16296. An act to provide for issuing of patents for public lands claimed under the homestead laws by deserted wives.

H. R. 1818. An act to regulate the interstate transportation of immature calves was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. R. 11822 An act to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

H. R. 18202. An act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill just read and to have it referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask that the notice be repeated?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed that section 2 be amended by inserting after the second paragraph of said section a new paragraph reading as follows:

Under like conditions the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to direct that the navy yards of the United States and all their equipment and dockage facilities be used for the purpose of repairing and keeping in a seaworthy condition all merchant vessels to be or now registered under the American flag under such conditions as in their discretion are just and equitable: Provided, That such additional use of said navy yards and their equipment shall not in any way interfere with the paramount purposes of the Navy of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill and the amendment will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

MEDIATION IN EUROPEAN WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a Senate resolution, to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that it may be printed to-day and we may have it before the committee at our meeting to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless there is some special reason why it should be offered now, I must object.

Mr. McCUMBER. The special reason is that I should like to bring it up to-morrow at the committee meeting. It is very short. The purpose of the introduction is simply that it may be printed. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator in what shape it is. Is it a resolution to be acted upon by the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. By the committee. I want to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that it may be read, so that it may go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 435), as follows:

Whereas a war is now pending in Europe, the magnitude of which threatens a destruction of life and property and a devastation of resources greater than any disaster that has overtaken the world during all of its recorded history; and

Whereas the people of the whole world must in the end share in the appalling suffering and loss thus entailed upon future generations; and

Whereas the United States is the only great power of the world whose national interests are not directly affected by the causes or results of said war; and

Whereas the interest of the peace, prosperity, and happiness, as well as the dictates of humanity, demand that every possible effort shall be made to check and prevent the horrors and devastation of such war; and

Whereas by race, blood, and affinity the citizenship of the United States represents all of the warring elements in that strife, and the friendly offices of this country would be thereby freed from the imputation of unfair sympathies with or prejudices against either of the contending countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That it is the judgment of the Senate that the President diplomatically approach the said countries of Europe and offer the good services of this country in securing, by mediation or arbitration, the friendly settlement of their international differences, to the end that this calamitous war may be averted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to a substitute therefor as follows, to wit: After the word "and," in line 9, page 3, insert: "to suspend also the conditions and limitations of section 5 of said act, except that no bank shall be permitted to issue circulating notes in excess of 125 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus. He shall require each bank and currency association to maintain on deposit in the Treasury of the United States a sum in gold sufficient in his judgment for the redemption of such notes, but in no event less than 5 per cent. He"; after the word "to," line 12, page 3, insert "as herein amended."

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1, and agree to the substitute as above set forth.

ROBERT L. OWEN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CARTER GLASS,
C. A. KORBLY,
E. A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that the conference report be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, because of the earnest desire of the Treasury Department for legislation I do not intend to oppose the conference report, except to express my views. I think that 125 per cent of its capital and surplus is too large an issue to permit a bank to make. I think the Senate amendment should have been adhered to. I also believe that the gold reserve which was not incorporated in the original bill is a desirable feature, but that the per cent should have been more than 5—that it should have been at least 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, until recently upright American business men regarded the American Government as their friend, and justly so, for the prosperity of industry was recognized by the Government as a necessity to all parts of the public. The officials of the Government were predisposed to assist in bringing it about. To help in creating and maintaining it was regarded as one of the first duties of Government employees. Thus, the Agricultural Department was devising means to help the farmers by scientific study of farm operations, by distributing reports of investigations, by special examinations where they were asked for. The Forestry Bureau was established to assist in bringing about better forestry methods; it studied the subject and sent its agents out to teach more scientific systems. In the same way our Consular Service was utilized. It began to gather information from foreign countries, and a most excellent and efficient system of daily reports was established to make the information available. The Pan American Union was established to promote Central and South American trade, to give aid and information to the exporters of this country, and to help them in extending their markets. Irrigation projects of great importance were undertaken, holding out the promise of great benefit to the people of certain sections of the country. The construction of the Panama Canal was undertaken. All of these and other things like them created an atmosphere of friendliness and helpfulness throughout the official world. Nothing perhaps contributed more to this official disposition than the established policy of protection, for the very basis of that policy is the belief that it is a proper function of the American Government to aid American industry. So, through all departments there was a spirit of helpfulness, and constructive legislation was the fashion of the time. Punishment, where punishment was necessary, was the function of the Attorney General and his staff, and was left to them to perform.

But recently this condition has changed. Circumstances arose that induced a different frame of mind. The Nation began to be very prosperous, a prosperity that was generally shared in by all occupations: the laborer, farmer, merchant, and manufacturer were all doing well—in most cases were doing very well, indeed. But here and there a few were doing better than the average, and perhaps unduly better. So some of us, overlooking our share in the general betterment, became a little envious and others became a little frightened—perhaps not altogether unjustified; but, like most human tendencies, it was exaggerated. We saw a vision of all wealth, and hence of all power, being gathered together into a few hands.

People began to counsel together as to what they should do about it. The public press, quick to respond to the thought of the day, found a profitable field in attacking wealth and its owners. The yellow newspapers and the muckraking magazines were the popular literature. Then Government officials began to have a different view; the idea of helping trade ceased to be the prevailing thought of official life. To discover and punish malefactors of great wealth was substituted for it. The Interstate Commerce Commission attended to the railroads; the Attorney General looked after the trusts; the departments gave all the help they could, and whatever suspicions thing the press and the Nation overlooked the States took a hand at. Congress has shared the spirit of the times. We have had investigating committees galore. The Steel Trust and the Tobacco Trust and the Money Trust and the stock exchange and the cotton exchange and the lobby have all been looked after, and we have learned a great deal about a great many people. Then we thought that perhaps the tariff helped some Americans to get too rich, so we changed that, too, and turned some of our work over to the people of other countries to see how our people liked being without it.

And, in consequence of all this, many Government officials are acting as though they believed the successful detection of something improper or criminal was the only road to popularity, and as a result even the 99 per cent of honest and upright business men of the country have become afraid of the Government. They are suspicious of it, for the threat of something to come is in the atmosphere. So they are hesitating about going ahead. They are waiting to see what is going to turn up, and, as a result, initiative is paralyzed and progress halts.

This movement was perhaps necessary to meet the situation that existed. There was a real danger to be met, but the methods that were used to meet it are destructive methods. They had to be; but, Mr. President, it is not good policy to go any further along that line than is absolutely necessary. We have already gone a long distance in that direction, and the business situation in this country is already showing signs that perhaps we have gone too far. We are a progressive people. We want to build things up, and we can not do that by unnecessarily hampering those processes of trade that the circumstances of our generation call into existence.

Nevertheless, it seems to me that it is in that frame of mind that this bill has been prepared, for it is a punitive bill throughout all its provisions. It proposes to establish what is practically a new department of the Government, in the form of a trade commission, but there is nothing in any part of the bill to suggest that this new department is to look for opportunities to help trade. On the contrary, it is establishing an extraordinarily clumsy instrument to rake over all the activities of commerce with a fine-tooth comb, subjecting everybody engaged in it to inconvenience, annoyance, and expense, to see if somewhere or somehow some unsuspected wrongdoing can not be brought to light. It offers no helping hand to upright merchants. It is only adding a new and untried kind of police and detective force to those we already have. The name "trade commission," at first thought, suggests something helpful. We have an Agricultural Department, and it is the duty and practice of that department to help the farmer. This year's appropriation for that purpose is nearly $10,000,000. We have recently established a Department of Labor, and it is actively looking for opportunities to assist the laborer and make his lot easier. But there is nothing of this sort in the legislation now proposed. The commission is given the most extraordinary powers for investigating trade and manufacturing, but the sole purpose of that investigation is to discover something to punish.

I do not believe the establishment of such a commission is wise at this time, and I have come to this conclusion in spite of a former belief to the contrary. When I first came to this body in 1911 I was very strongly of the opinion that a trade commission of some sort was advisable. As a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, almost from the beginning of my term, I have had this subject continually under consideration. That committee has held extended hearings on this subject at which a very large number of witnesses have appeared and given their views in regard to a commission, and in various ways that committee has had the subject of trade regulation before it during all this time. As a result of such consideration, I have changed my mind on this subject, and do not believe that the time has yet come when this legislation is necessary. I think that such a commission and such legislation as is now proposed, instead of doing anything to clarify the situation, will complicate it and that such a commission as is now proposed is extremely unwise. I am opposed to it because of the enormous and arbitrary powers which are intrusted to it, because the purposes for which these powers are to be used are not limited nor defined, because to confer such powers on such a body is dangerous and an infringement on the reasonable liberties and independence of the people, because the methods this commission are to use are a most roundabout and inefficient way to accomplish the purposes so far proposed for it, because it will be most costly to the Government and to a far greater extent to the people themselves, and because it is unnecessary.

The attempt has been made to create a feeling that this commission is a harmless thing, that nothing in particular is going to result from its creation, that it will be a sort of a good-natured body which, in a fatherly sort of way, will caution business men and in a friendly spirit take them under the arm when they have stumbled and gently lead them into the paths of righteousness. Thus the distinguished Senator from Nevada, who has charge of this bill, says that "it is a very simple bill" and compares the powers of the commission with those of the Bureau of Corporations, to show how little they may be feared.

In a speech introducing the bill, June 25, speaking of its powers, he says:

> Those powers are somewhat enlarged over those of the Bureau of Corporations, but they are not materially enlarged. The Bureau of Corporations did not find it necessary to use coercive powers with the corporations of the country. It used its power wisely and discreetly, and usually succeeded in getting all the information that it required. We heard of no abuse of personal rights under that organization, and I take it that the outcry raised against the so-called inquisitorial powers of this commission will be found in practical experience to have been unnecessary.

I find that the impression thus sought to be conveyed exists in the minds of many business men, and they are rather inclined to favor a commission on the ground that it will ward off something worse, but I do not agree that the Bureau of Corporations in the slightest degree offers an analogy to what the operations of this proposed body will be. If that view of the case is true, and this trade commission is to be nothing more than a slightly enlarged Bureau of Corporations, then all of us here are wasting our time, both those who advocate the measure and those who oppose it, and the consideration it has had by the trade organizations and the business men of this country is time thrown away, for great results will not be obtained by a powerless commission. Neither great regulative and beneficial results will be obtained, such as those favoring this measure hope for, nor will any of the dangers ensue that those people fear who see in it a tyrannical creation pursuing its course unhampered by the restrictions which have heretofore protected the innocent from the undue interference of the representatives of the law. Even the Senator from Nevada himself, I think, in reality does not expect that this commission will be any such harmless and inefficient body, for, in another part of his speech in introducing this bill, he says:

> Mr. President, I believe that if this act is passed there will be a marvelous change in the business conditions of the country for the better.

And in the report which he made to accompany this bill when it was introduced, referring to the Bureau of Corporations, he says:

> The field which has been covered has necessarily been restricted and its organization as a division of an executive department under a single head, reporting only to the President, has not given it either the authority or prestige which attaches to an independent commission, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Yet the need of such a position is quite as necessary in the governmental supervision of industrial activities as of railroads. The establishment of a trade commission at the same time that the Interstate Commerce Commission was established would have prevented the extraordinary development of monopolistic organizations in industry.

I think this latter picture of the extent of the powers and influence of this commission is the real one. I do not think that its results would be for the better, but that it will produce a marvelous change in the conditions under which business is carried on I do not for a moment doubt, and I do not for a moment doubt that that is the real result that the few people on this floor who sincerely believe in the advisability of this measure and the few people throughout the country who understand it and sincerely believe in it expect.

To see that this commission is not meant to be simply a slightly enlarged Bureau of Corporations, it is only necessary to look at the respective duties assigned to the two bodies. The duty of the Bureau of Corporations is to make—diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation—

And to report—to the President from time to time as he shall require.

The trade commission is given authority to investigate as often as it desires and to require annual reports from all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and to require such special reports from any of them from time to time as it may deem advisable, and it reports the result of its activities annually to Congress instead of reporting only to the President as he shall from time to time require. This contemplates an entirely different sphere of operations for the trade commission from that assigned to the Bureau of Corporations. It is manifestly intended that the entire trade of the country, so far as it is in corporate form, shall be under its constant supervision and subject to its inspection. The bureau has dealt with only such particular corporations as from time to time gave indications, from the character of their operations, that there might possibly be connected with them some violation of the law. The creation of this new body contemplates, and more or less requires, investigation into the affairs of every corporation in the hope that by so dealing with all the large percentage of properly conducted business the few cases of wrongdoing will in some way be discovered. Moreover, as the Senator from Nevada has well said, the prestige and authority of a commission composed of five members, at a salary of $10,000 each, is an entirely different proposition from a single head of a bureau with a salary of $5,000 and who is himself, to a certain extent, under the control of his department chief.

But the essential difference, after all, is in the amount of money that Congress may place at the disposition of the two bodies. The Bureau of Corporations had an appropriation last year of $251,300, of which $78,300 was for salaries and $173,000 was for the performance of the various duties assigned to it. The Interstate Commerce Commission this year has an appropriation made for it of $3,500,000, and the chief reason it is able to cover the large field in which it is engaged is the size of the appropriation that is made for it by Congress. Congress, it is true, will still have the power of enlarging or limiting the activities of this new trade commission in proportion as it chooses to appropriate money for it, but it is scarcely to be doubted that the influence of a commission composed, as that probably will be, of energetic and ambitious men, intent upon establishing their importance and enlarging the scope of their activities, will be able to give plausible reasons for ample appropriations.

Moreover, the duties that will be assigned to this commission undoubtedly will constantly grow. The bill itself now before the Senate is an evidence of this. For several weeks the bill as it was discussed in the committee which had it in charge simply contemplated a commission with powers of investigation and of reporting. But within a very few days before the bill was reported to the Senate, section 5, assigning to it the entirely new duty of controlling the nebulous field of unfair competition, was added to it, and in the Clayton bill, since reported, still other important duties are assigned to it. The mere existence of such a convenient body will be a constant invitation to everybody with a grievance, in or out of Congress, to try to put upon it the additional duty of overseeing the particular thing that may be troubling them. And it will be very easy for designing individuals to take advantage of this opportunity in those times of popular excitement which, under the instigation of a sensation-loving press, are constantly occurring, to find opportunities of employing this trade commission. Powers and duties once given to the commission will be very difficult, as a practical proposition, to ever withdraw; so, once created, the extent to which it will likely grow is almost impossible to foresee. It is only human for the commissioners themselves to be constantly seeking opportunities to enlarge their powers.

Therefore, in considering this legislation, I think we must not suppose for a moment that we are establishing anything but a strong and powerful body which is going to have a vast influence upon the future business development of this country. The President thinks it is of such importance that he is using all his great influence to compel the passage of this measure at this session of Congress. He certainly would not think this was necessary if he thought what was being done was unimportant. Feeble things are not effective things, and if the President thinks this course is necessary, he thinks so because he believes that what is being created is going to be a powerful and controlling body.

The powers given to the commission are such that it must act at times as a sort of national police or detective force prying, in the name of investigation, into the doings of practically everyone engaged in business; and doing it not because there is necessarily any apparent evidence of wrongdoing, but because that is made the general duty of the commission—the primary purpose for which it is created—and the success of the commission depends upon their finding somebody guilty of something. Therefore they are given an incentive to believe every act wrong which on its face is of a doubtful character.

If the commission went ahead three or four years under these broad detective powers, and no case of wrongful action were discovered by them, it would be manifest that there was no occasion for their existence at all. Therefore, in order to keep their office, in order to justify the creation of the commission at all in the sight of the people, they must necessarily find somebody to punish. It is very easy for anybody so disposed to find actions that may be given a suspicious character. I do not believe there is a group of business men in this country whose operations have been continued for any length of time, however innocent in reality they may be of any wrong intention or wrongdoing, whose actions when subjected to the minute scrutiny of an overzealous searcher for trouble would not be capable of some interpretation that might be very difficult to explain. All the reasons and causes which lead up to the involved operations of modern business are not spread upon the books or the records of corporations. They could not be, for they would make these records too voluminous to be useful. These causes and reasons exist only in the knowledge of the men who are acting from day to day, often under the pressure of immediate decision, and all that appears as of record is the result of what was done, that such and such a vote was had, that such and such a sale was made. The memories of the men who conduct these operations are naturally unreliable; they have no occasion ordinarily to charge their minds with all the circumstances of the cases, and the men themselves pass away or change to other employment, so that it is impossible to obtain the evidence. I have had many such cases in my own experience where it has been a practical impossibility to explain exactly the circumstances of transactions that have occurred even after the lapse of a comparatively brief time. The memories of the people engaged in them were too vague and conflicting to give any certain information. When such conditions are put under the critical eyes of employees of a commission predisposed to be critical there will be no end to the annoying charges that business men will be subjected to.

I think it is also a great source of danger that in addition to the commission being first charged with these detective duties it is also empowered to act in a judicial capacity, for the commissioners will come to the judgment seat in many cases with the case prejudged. As it is the evidence their own representatives have collected which is the basis of their decisions, they must have every disposition to uphold its integrity, and in this respect they are given a broader power than any court in the land. The case the judge decides is one in whose make-up he has had no part. It is brought before him by the parties interested, and if the Government is one of them it is the United States attorney who is responsible for the correctness of the charges upon which the case rests and the evidence presented is of his selection. No pride of consistency, so far as the judge is concerned, is involved in the proceedings at all. Just the opposite will be the situation in many of the cases that this commission is called upon to decide, for before the accused can be brought before them and their side of the case heard, the commission must have already decided that the evidence is entitled to some standing. Under these circumstances, it would not be human nature, however great the desire of the commission to be just might be, for them to be impartial, and when you add to that the fact that the continuance of the salaries upon which they live depends upon at least some of the charges being sustained, how can it be possible for such a tribunal to be entirely without prejudice? It is contrary to all the principles and theories upon which our American system of justice has been founded. Entire confidence in the disinterestedness of the court is the basis of the trust with which the American people submit their differences to its decision. To introduce this other element at all seems to me a most dangerous innovation, even if it were applied to the simple things about which men differ, but when such a tribunal is to pass upon the intricate and technical operations of general business, such a condition is fatal to fairness and justice.

Just how costly this commission is going to be is very difficult to forecast, but that it will be immensely expensive I think no one who gives thought to the subject can doub.. It will be expensive to the Government. The Interstate Commerce Commission, dealing with only some 3,000 organizations, and those engaged entirely in one business, that of transportation, has already grown so that the appropriation for this year, as I have already stated, will be $3,500,000. This trade commission will have to deal with a very much greater number of organizations. The guide we have as to what that number will be is that there were about 309,000 corporations that reported under the corporation-tax law this last year. Some of these are of very little importance, and others, like banks, etc., are not subject to the commission; but some of the witnesses in the hearings before the committee estimated that there would be at least 200,000 corporations that would come under the control of this trade commission. And these are not engaged in a homogeneous business as are the transportation companies, but in producing all the great variety of products that are required to meet the modern demands for necessities and luxuries. I scarcely suppose the expenditures of this body will bear the same relation to those of the Interstate Commerce Commission as the number of trade corporations bears to those of transportation corporations, but I do expect that to perform properly the duties that are committed to the commission, and which the commission will be anxious to perform—and which they must perform or there will be no reason for their existence—will before long require very much larger appropriations than are now being mad for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] in his address upon this subject went into the question of the cost of this commission to the Government in a very elaborate and complete way. I do not want to do more than to call attention to that side of the question, because he has so amply covered the ground; but what I want particularly to call attention to is the fact that the cost to the Government is not the real cost to the community of such a body; it is the cost to which the business of the country is going to be put in meeting the requirements of the commission that demands consideration.

One of the witnesses testified that he thought $100 would be a moderate estimate of the cost to each corporation that has to make annual reports. He had no particular basis on which to make his estimate, but he was apparently familiar with subjects of this kind. If he is correct, it would mean that for this item alone $20,000,000 would be added to the present cost of producing the merchandise of the country.

I will say that later on the witness to whom I have referred, Mr. Shaw, editor of System, a Chicago magazine of business, sent a letter to the committee saying that he had revised his estimate of the cost of these annual reports and that, instead of $100, he thought at least $200 would be required for the purpose.

Another witness before the committee, Mr. Bennett, of New York, went into the matter to some little extent, and subsequently wrote an article in regard to the matter for the New York Sun. In the course of that article he stated that he thought the cost of the commission will amount to $58,000,000, and he goes into a very elaborate explanation of the figures and the calculations by which he arrives at those figures. It is impossible of course for anybody to say exactly what the cost will be, but nobody who has given it any attention at all has arrived at any other conclusion than that the cost must be enormous.

The testimony given by these witnesses related to the cost of annual reports. As to what the cost of making special investigations will be I have not found any very reliable basis for an estimate. I presume the data exist somewhere, but I have asked in several directions without getting very much information. It certainly must be a matter of very serious consequences, so serious—not merely from the actual expenditure of money, but from the equally if not greater importance of interruption of business and diversion of thought to the details of what is often a long, dragged-out lawsuit—that paying any reasonable fine without trial in ordinary cases would perhaps be preferable as far as the cost is concerned to a verdict of not guilty. I did find one or two straws that throw some light on the cost of these investigations. In the case just decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, for permission to increase rates by the eastern railroads, the cost of making out the new rate schedules for the Pennsylvania Railroad alone was $450,000, and the estimate of the cost for all the roads engaged in the suit is estimated at from $1,500,000 to $1,800,000. This is for the sole item of preparing the new rate schedules. So far as the decision is against the railroads, or so far as it is for any compromise rate less than what they ask for, the cost of all this work will have been thrown away and new schedules will have to be prepared, at whatever additional cost it may be. What the whole expense of presenting this request to the commission may have been to the railroads I do not know, but that it is no inconsiderable item is evident from this statement.

An item appeared not long since in the press, stating that a prominent western railway official had said that—

> The expenditures per annum for statistics required by various State railway commissions, the expenses of hearings on rates and other matters, and all the other details that go to make up railroading by commission amounted to $250,000 per annum, and added, "We never know what information a State commission may ask, so we must be prepared to furnish at a moment's notice figures on every conceivable subject relating to railroading. To do this a large office force with expert statisticans is kept busy the year round."

In the report to the stockholders of the present president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, under date of April 11, 1914, referring to some causes of increased expenses, he says:

> The cost of accounting 10 years ago was $190,000 per year. At the present time it is about $500,000 per year. While the increase in business has had its effect on accounting cost, part of the increase is due to the accounting requirements of the Interstate Commerce and State Commissions.
> The recent Federal act requiring the valuation of railways will increase the expenses of this company about $60,000 per year for several years.

I found upon inquiry that the cost to the Bureau of Corporations of making an investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, which they did two or three years ago, amounted to the enormous sum to the Government alone of $110,994. We have no testimony, so far as I know, as to what the cost may have been to the corporation itself.

All these stray items are sufficient indications of the fact that in starting upon this new system of investigation and of supervision we are going to run both the Government and the trade and commerce of the country into enormous expenditures.

It is rather unfortunate that we have not full information of the cost to transportation that has been caused by the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission and State commissions, for however valuable or necessary their services may have been, these items of additional cost are necessary to understand the real situation. In considering the result of this trade commission, therefore, we ought not to lose sight of the costly nature of the experiment. I have no doubt myself that it will add millions and millions of dollars to the cost of production of the articles used in the trade of the United States, and I am sorry that there is not somewhere some more definite information to be obtained upon this very important phase; for the ultimate result of such expenditures must undoubtedly be borne by the consumers of the articles as an addition to the already burdensome cost of living.

To realize fully what these costs are likely to be and to get a clear conception of the relation in which the commission will stand to the business of the country, it is necessary to consider just what its powers are and what its duties are.

It is provided under section 3 of the trade commission bill that the commission shall have power:

(a) To investigate any corporation engaged in commerce as often as it may deem advisable, including its relations to other corporations individuals, associations, or partnerships.

(b) To require the production of all documents in any way affecting its commerce with any individual, association, or partnership.

(c) To prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations as the commission may direct.

(d) To make public such information, except so far as may be necessary to protect trade processes, names of customers, and such other matters as the commission may deem not to be of public importance.

To discover the purposes for which the commission is to gather this information we must find what its duties are. It is required of the commission under (g) of section 3 of the trade commission bill that if the commission believes from its inquiries that any corporation, individual, association, or partnership has violated any law of the United States regulating commerce it shall report its findings to the Attorney General. And under section 5 the commission is directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce. These are the broad duties it is directed to perform under the trade commission bill.

Under the Clayton bill, now on the calendar, it is authorized to enforce compliance with sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of that act; that is, under section 2, to prevent any person from directly or indirectly discriminating in prices for the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor; under section 4, to prevent any person from making a sale or fixing a price on the condition that the purchaser shall not deal in the commodities of a competitor; under section 8, to prevent a corporation from acquiring any stock in another corporation if it substantially lessens competition between the two or creates a monopoly of any line of commerce; under section 9, to prevent any person being a director in two or more corporations having a capital of more than $1,000,000 and which are, or which at any time have been, competitors, so that the elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

It is evident from this résumé that the field of their duties is tremendous, when it is remembered that it applies to some 200,000 units, for it is not merely that they are authorized to do these things, it will be their duty to do them. And the method by which they are to be put in a position to perform that duty are, first, to get an intimation of the situation by requiring annual reports from all the corporations that are subject to their jurisdiction and, second, when they find anything in these annual reports, or from other sources, to cause suspicion to conduct special investigations.

Now, to cover the duties assigned to them, these annual reports will have to be most voluminous. Just what the authors of this bill had in mind would be covered by these annual reports, I do not know. I have not heard it discussed in any committee meeting or elsewhere. Perhaps the idea was merely that it should be a sort of financial statement to show the volume of business from year to year, or of a profit-and-loss account, with the idea of determining who is making too much money. This, perhaps, would not be very burdensome to the people reporting, although it would be burdensome to the commission if they were to make any real use of it, for to tabulate, compare, and digest 200,000 reports is no simple undertaking.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. WEST. That was the estimate in reference to corporations. If you take in individuals, partnerships, and associations, as well as corporations, would it not exceed 200,000?

Mr. LIPPITT. It is a very curious situation, as I shall point out later in regard to this bill, that while in some cases they are instructed to report the shortcomings of individuals to the Attorney General and to have supervision over their obeying certain laws that are to be passed, they have no authority to get any information in regard to individuals. The trade commission has no power to investigate individuals. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] says that that clause has been amended. I was not aware of that.

Mr. WEST. I do not so understand. I think the position which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] takes is correct.

Mr. JONES. I understand the provision of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which has been agreed to, allows the commission to investigate individuals, partnerships, and corporations.

Mr. THOMAS. It does not require statements from them.

Mr. JONES. It does not require statements.

Mr. THOMAS. That is confined to corporations.

Mr. LIPPITT. There have been a number of amendments put upon the bill in the last day or two, and I am not familiar with every one of them. It may be that they do have the power of investigating individuals.

I was saying that to tabulate, compare, and digest 200,000 reports is no simple undertaking. Unless something of this kind is done with them, so that some real action is to follow their collection, manifestly the whole proceeding is a farce and the reports might as well be thrown in the waste-pape. basket.

If these reports are to be published, as seems to be contemplated by the provisions of this bill, and if each one of them occupied an ordinary sized page, the report of the commission would constitute a moderate library each year.

I have here, Mr. President, a book of ordinary size, containing about 1,300 pages. If each one of the annual reports of these corporations occupied a page the size of this book, about 175 books of that size would be required to contain them, and they would occupy a book shelf more than 32 feet long. It is evident that any such voluminous report as that could not possibly be of any service.

But if any such moderate idea was what was originally intended, the duties it is already proposed for the commission to perform have exploded it. The reports would have to be most voluminous if all the trade legislation that is now proposed becomes a law and they are to be of any use.

For instance, under section 2 of the Clayton bill the commission is directed to see to it that no persons engaged in commerce shall either directly or indirectly discriminate in the prices of merchandise they sell. This means the commission would have to find out whether or not there was any discrimination in price either by a special investigation or by these annual reports. If they were going to thoroughly cover the ground, it would seem as though the reports would have to show all the sales made by all the producers in the United States. They could not very well ask the venders to make a report merely of the sales that had been made at different prices, and they could not justly simply pick out certain individuals and compel them to make reports at great expense and interference with their business while their competitors are allowed to go free.

Under section 8 of the Clayton bill the commission is required to see that no corporation acquires any part of the stock of any other corporation, and again the powers put into its hands to perform this duty are these annual reports and special investigations. I presume the annual report, therefore, would have to require a statement from each reporting corporation showing what, if any, stock had been purchased or was held, and a statement perhaps to show whether the purchase did or did not substantially lessen competition.

Under section 9 of the Clayton bill, which provides that no person shall occupy two or more directorships, I suppose the annual report would have to deal with this question, would perhaps have to include a list of all the directors, with an affidavit from each one that that was the only directorship he held, or, in case a man held more than one directorship, there would have to be some statement to show not only that the two corporations on which he was serving were not then competing, but that they never had competed in their whole existence, for this section provides that no person shall be a director in more than one corporation if such corporations are or shall have been theretofore competitors. Just why it is necessary to prevent a man occupying a directorship in two corporations because 20 years ago they might have been engaged in some competitive business but are not now, is one of the things I suppose will be explained to us when the Clayton bill comes before the Senate. On a casual reading of the bill I have not been able to understand the purpose of that provision.

These are some of the situations the trade commission will have to meet under the duties proposed for it by the Clayton bill. In addition to that, in the trade-commission bill, the commission is instructed from its inquiries and investigations to report to the Attorney General whether any corporation, individual, association, or partnership has violated any law of the United States regulating commerce. Just the extent to which reports would be necessary to cover the enormous range of these requirements I have not undertaken to discover.

Moreover, it is provided here that the commission shall report not only upon the violations of law by corporations, but upon the violations by any individual.

I had understood until the remarks that were made a few minutes ago that the commission was not given any power to investigate individuals at all. It was not given any such power in the original form in which the bill was reported, but if it is to have the power of investigating individuals and partnerships and requiring annual reports from them, of course the voluminous nature of these reports will be very much greater than what I have been trying to call attention to, where it was confined only to some 200,000. It will, of course, be evident that if the commission should even remotely attempt to require annual reports to thoroughly cover this situation, the cost of them would put an enormous task upon the business men of the country, much larger than any figure anybody has yet suggested. Moreover, it is perfectly manifest that such reports would be absolutely useless, for they would involve such an amount of labor for their tabulation or use by the committee as to inevitably swamp it.

What, then, will be the alternative that the commission will adopt? The bill calls for uniform reports. That can not mean anything other than reports from everybody. But, if they cut the Gordian knot and select certain particular corporations from whom they are going to make these requirements, on what principle of selection is the commission going to proceed? Is it to be because some jealous or disgruntled competitor or customer wants to put a corporation to trouble and expense, or what will be the grounds on which some group of business men in this country are set apart from other business men to come under the surveillance of this commission? If the commission are to proceed in this matter simply according to their own will, guided by no definite rule of procedure or by any regulation of Congress, it seems to me that we are creating an opportunity for a political machine, the like of which has never yet been seen even in this country, where ingenuity and ability have been able to create some very efficient examples in that direction. Why, Mr. President, the powers which a body of this kind whose actions will be controlled, if this bill is passed in its present form, by no limitation except such as their own will may determine, is a proposition with opportunities for oppression that it is impossible to exaggerate.

The cost and trouble of meeting an investigation of the complicated business operations of even a moderate sized corporation in this country, when that investigation is conducted by men who for any reason are inclined to be hostile, is something that will well make men pause before they will subject themselves to it. It makes no difference what the ultimate result of that investigation may be as regards the guilt or innocence of the parties, the expense and the trouble of the trial are the same whatever the verdict may be. Everyone knows that in spite of any altruistic ideas or laws to the contrary, the most vital element in conducting a political campaign is to-day, as it always has been, the question of getting the funds to meet its expenses. What sort of power will an administration have in the way of raising political funds with the control of a body having such powers as this trade commission will have. Why, the mere suggestion of an investigation would pour thousands of dollars into the political war chest where hundreds could not be obtained in any other way. What a bungling and uncouth method this is, to subject all the innocent business men of this country to the burden of meeting the requirements of this commission, for the sole reason that perhaps 1 per cent of their number may be found guilty of some wrong. Its operation will be a sort of hunt through the haystack of innocence to find a needle of crime. I suppose some needles will be found, but the results will be out of all proportion to the effort.

I think, therefore, it is evident that this device of a commission to operate through the medium of special investigations and of annual reports and to cover by these means the enormous territory that is assigned to it, inevitably leads to its being swamped by the volume of data it will gather if it endeavors to treat all business impartially, or it will result in gross unfairness and favoritism if it proceeds on some selective principle. And to endow it with such broad powers, the exercise of which against an innocent party will be an intolerable burden financially and an offense to an innocent man's proper pride of self-respect, is introducing an utterly new and unnecessarily offensive practice in the relations between our Government and its citizens and one which will weaken the respect and confidence which citizens ought to have toward the Government, and which they must have for the Government to continue to have the people's cordial support and confidence. It is the very situation which the fourth amendment to the Constitution, the search and seizure clause, which provides—

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized—was designed to prevent.

Every student of American history knows of the tremendous opposition developed to the adoption of the Constitution, because it did not contain a bill of rights. The State of Rhode Island was the last of the 13 original States to give its approval to the Constitution, and the State did not give it until after the first 10 amendments had been adopted. The State was very much criticized at the time of its hesitation, but it arose perhaps out of the fact that the people of that State had been fighting longer for the establishment of liberty—first the religious liberty and then the political liberty—than any other community of its day. They were very tenacious of the rights they had acquired and, as Madison put it, were determined to prevent the—> encroachments upon those safeguards which they (the people) have been long accustomed to have interposed between them and the magistrate who exercises the sovereign power.

I think, Mr. President, that the power proposed in regard to this commission vindicates the position that the people of Rhode Island took at that time, and that this body, if it is created at all, should only be allowed to exercise its powers after some reasonable ground had been established for such action. The world has been fighting since the day of King John and the Magna Charta to protect the people against unreasonable control by the powers of governments, and it is a step backward to subject innocent people to the methods that it is proposed to have this commission exercise.

The new laws that it is proposed to pass as part of this trade legislation, or any new laws that may be required on that subject or any other, can be perfectly well administered and enforced in the way in which the laws of this Government have been enforced since its creation, and we have been able under the long-established procedure to maintain a very good Government to live under, as good a Government certainly as there is anywhere in the world, and no necessity that I know of has yet arisen to abandon these time-tried methods for this experimental commission government.

I have been waiting during this discussion for somebody who favors this bill to demonstrate why this trade commission is necessary. I should have been glad to have heard the arguments upon which that necessity was based. Certainly, a commission in and of itself is not a desirable thing. The only excuse for its creation should be that we can not get along without it; that some important objects can not be accomplished by other and more simple means, and I think the same thing may be said of most of the so-called trade legislation that is now under consideration. The necessity for it is not apparent. It is true that there was a situation in the recent past when some branches of the business of the country were being combined into such large units as to cause alarm. But I think it is equally true that that condition does not exist at the present moment. The various laws now on the statute books have demonstrated their efficiency to control this situation. New combinations are not being formed; if they are, the accounts of them are being kept out of the press. Instead of a rush to form new combinations, almost the opposite is true. Not only new combinations are not being formed, but the business initiative of this country is so paralyzed by the actions that have dissolved some of the large units that people are afraid of new enterprises and they are not being undertaken to the extent that they ought to be for the continued commercial progress of the country even where they might be without violating any of the principles of the antitrust laws. That certainly is the situation as I see it, and as many others see it, and I do not know of any better testimony I could produce to the correctness of this view than what was said about the matter in an address delivered by Mr. George W. Wickersham, formerly Attorney General of the United States, before the Academy of Political and Social Science in Philadelphia on the 16th of last February. When arguing on these grounds and affirming the undesirability of additional trade legislation, he said of the existing law:

> By the application of its provisions every one of the great combinations which are popularly known as trusts has been dissolved at the suit of the Government, or is now a defendant resisting the suit of the Government to compel its dissolution.
> I challenge anyone to point to-day to a single organization outside of the defendants in pending Government suits that may properly be called a private monopoly. Moreover, the tendency to concentrate control over industry has been absolutely arrested. Not one monopolistic trust has been formed in the United States since the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases.

And further on he said:

> The Sherman law needs no amendment to strengthen its provisions, and a watchful enforcement of that law by the law officers of the Government will be amply sufficient to prevent any recurrence of the conditions which grew up prior to the decisions in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], in his remarks when introducing this bill, said:

> The establishment of a trade commission at the same time that the Interstate Commerce Commission was established would have prevented the extraordinary development of monopolistic organization in industry. If this commission had been in existence during this period, we would not now have to deal with such organizations as the United States Steel Corporation, the International Harvester Co., etc.

But Mr. Wickersham, who has had more experience in applying existing antitrust laws than any other man in the country and an extraordinarily successful experience, and who knows the problems connected with the situation probably better than any other man does, says we have all the law needed to control the very situation that the Senator from Nevada relies upon to justify the creation of this commission.

To be sure, it is intended in the legislation now proposed to penalize some things in connection with business that have not been penalized heretofore, and if we are going to create some new crime, there may be a use found for this commission, but inasmuch as the new crimes are mostly for the purpose of helping to enforce the law against actions that are already made crimes by the antitrust laws, and as the present antitrust laws are sufficient to regulate these crimes, I see no necessity for either the new crimes or the new commission. Anyway, the orderly procedure would seem to be to enact the laws establishing the crime before we appoint the trade commission, for there is no certainty that even if the trade commission is appointed all the other propositions will be enacted into law. The simple fact is that such a commission and such legislation as is now being proposed, instead of doing anything to clarify the situation, would complicate it just as the business men of the country were on the point of finding some clear ground to go ahead on, and it will complicate it because this legislation ignores the real problem that is at the foundation of the present business uncertainty, for it deals with but one side of it.

There undoubtedly is a problem that ought to be solved in connection with the present trade situation, but the solution of that problem does not require the enactment of additional law to make combinations more difficult, but rather to find such legislation as will define the neutral ground between unrestricted competition on the one side and an unregulated combination on the other. All the laws we have put on the statute books thus far in connection with this subject have been for the purpose of restraining and restricting the field of combination and of keeping alive and active and unrestricted the field of competition.

This Government is a federation of States which was formed on the basis of the doctrine that in union there is strength, and that doctrine has vindicated itself in the powerful Nation we have grown into. In the same way modern business, as distinguished from the methods of the past, is based on the doctrine that in union there is economy and efficiency. The great material progress of this country in recent years has been largely due to that principle and to the adoption of better methods to bring about united efforts and teamwork on the part of individuals. The great material achievements that have marked the last quarter of a century and which were impossible before that date, but have been possible since, have been due undeniably, I think, to the more successful cooperation of individual resources. No better illustration, perhaps, could be found of this than in the magnificent success with which we have undertaken and carried to completion the construction of the Panama Canal. One reason that we succeeded as admirably as we have done in performing that task, although it had been found impossible of accomplishment by the greatest engineer of his day, backed by the resources of one of the great financial people of the world, was due to the fact that modern cooperation had made possible the construction of the powerful machines necessary for its execution and had taught the engineers of to-day the principles and methods of organization that made the efficient handling of large bodies of men a comparatively simple problem. Goethals succeeded where De Lesseps failed, not because competition had been kept alive and active, for competition was alive and active when the first attempt was made by the people of France, but because cooperation had been developed to-day to a point that was unknown 40 years ago.

A method and principle that have made such things as the Panama Canal possible, that has changed failure into success and helped to realize many of the material aspirations of humanity, can not be ignored in the legislative action it is necessary to take to harmonize the present trade conditions of the world. We may think that business has grown too big, we may criticize and try to limit it, but the lesson of efficiency and of economy that the world has learned can not be successfully ignored in dealing with the problem of American trade conditions. Cooperation in trade is a living, vital force that can not be neglected, and the problem therefore that has to be intelligently met in the legislation on that subject if the situation is to be put upon a permanent basis is in some way to clearly formulate into law the intermediate ground between an unlimited and unregulated and destructive competition on the one side and an unregulated and unlimited cooperation or combination on the other. There is, perhaps, danger in an excess of either of these two forces. Both of them are valuable in moderation and within limits, but the activities of modern trade are so complicated and intricate and the growth of this modern cooperation has been so rapid that we do not understand and can not yet formulate the reasonable and proper relations between the two. To simply ignore the great beneficial results that come from modern cooperation, however, will not advance us a single step in meeting the difficulties of the present situation. Nevertheless, that is what is being attempted in the present legislation. We are trying to still further put impediments in the way of the proper development of modern business principles, instead of trying to discover what is beneficial in the situation and what can be reasonably encouraged and approved. The fact is that the business men of to-day to successfully meet modern conditions must to some extent get together and confer, for they must know in some way what their competitors are doing and going to do before they can decide what they ought to do themselves.

The President, in his message on this subject of trade legislation, has spoken as though the defining of this situation was an easy and simple matter. He says:

> Legislation is a business of interpretation, not of origination; and it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter. It is not recent or hasty opinion. It springs out of the experience of a whole generation. It has clarified itself by long contest.

And again, in another part of the message:

> What we are purposing to do, therefore, is happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land

All this sounds delightfully easy and reassuring. It is as though Congress simply had to gather together and unanimously record a universally accepted verdict upon this subject. If that was the situation and it was now possible to clearly formulate into a statute some principle that would bring about the delightful result the President pictures, I certainly should join most heartily in the effort to do it. When I read this language in the light of three years' very careful study and consideration of the situation, I was certainly surprised that there existed anywhere this easy solution, for it certainly has not been reflected in any testimony I have ever come in contact with. On the contrary, all the evidence that has been gathered together so far goes to show the complicated nature of this question. Nevertheless, while this is generally true, there has been on the part of a large number of people who have studied this subject a harmony of opinion in one respect, and that is if a trade commission were to be established it ought to have some authority to pass in some way and to some degree upon the extent to which cooperation on the part of business men generally might be permitted, not for the purpose of enabling anybody to do anything that was contrary to law, or that was contrary to wise public policy, but as a means of determining, if only tentatively, what things could be done without violating any statute. This is the only way that I have heard suggested in which a trade commission can be of any help to the business men of the country, and is the only form of feasible constructive legislation on this subject that I know of. All that is being proposed so far is destructive in its character. It proposes to put a stop to what now exists, and the great trouble that will result from it is that it does not definitely define to what extent the old methods are to be forbidden and to what extent they may be continued to be used. Such legislation does not clarify, it complicates.

The whole tenor of the President's message was that the party he represented wished to do something and intended to do something to help the situation. It is universally agreed that the great majority of business men of this country are honest and law abiding, and they want to do the things the law contemplates they should do and leave undone the things it forbids. But the difficulty is for them to know just what is permitted and what is forbidden when, on account of the intricate and complicated nature of the problems that are dealt with, laws are necessarily enacted only in the most general terms. Occasionally it has been assumed that there is no difficulty about this matter, and that it ought to be possible for anybody to know just what procedure is permitted. The President, in the address which he made at Philadelphia on the Fourth of July, implied something of this sort. He said:

> The world is becoming more complicated every day, my fellow citizens. No man ought to be foolish enough to think that he understands it all. And, therefore, I am glad that there are some simple things in the world. One of the simple things is principle. Honesty is a perfectly simple thing. It is hard for me to believe that in most circumstances when a man has a choice of ways he does not know which is the right way and which is the wrong way.

Difficult as it may be for the President to understand this situation, it is one that constantly arises in the actual operations of business, and if all the trade legislation that is now under consideration by this body be enacted into law, I think the difficulty is going to be greater than ever. We have for some time had laws that forbade undue restraint of trade. We now propose to forbid unfair competition, and in the Clayton bill, to the consideration of which we have not yet come, but which is here on the calendar, we forbid changing the price of a commodity for the purpose of wrongfully injuring a competitor. Now, it seems to me that when an ordinary salesman, with the amount of learning in the law that generally goes with a $1,500 salary, appears in the store of a country merchant with his line of 100 or 150 different fabrics for which he is soliciting orders, and upon which he has already taken orders in other localities and perhaps in the same locality, and is met with the proposition that he can have an order for a dozen or 15 of his articles provided he will make some concession in the price on two or three or four of them, and he is told that the reason for asking that concession is that one of his competitors the day before, perhaps, offered something just as good at such a price, and that the customer will have to pass the entire line unless the concession is made on these two or three articles, that salesman is not going to find the situation clarified by anything that is contained in these bills.

When he has asked for an hour perhaps to think the proposition over and has gone over to the hotel lobby to consider whether, in accepting a proposition which under hitherto prevailing conditions he perhaps would not have hesitated about, and there tries to decide whether in so doing he is going to restrain trade or unfairly compete, or wrongfully injure, he will be in a situation where, as the President says, he has a choice of ways. But with the greatest desire in the world to be honest and law-abiding, it would be no perfectly simple thing for him to decide what choice to take. His position is still further complicated by the fact that even if he takes the order and some representative of our new trade commission discovers that these articles have been sold at different prices, and finds in that fact such a cause of suspicion that legal proceedings follow, the salesman and his employer will find themselves at the end of perhaps a year or two of litigation, even though it result in their favor, in almost as bad a position as though it were decided against them, for the burden in the way of expense and interruption of business and suspicion engendered by these proceedings is almost as great as the legal penalty itself.

I said a few minutes ago that there was a considerable harmony of opinion on the question of adopting some way by which the business men of the country could know to what extent they could be permitted to cooperate. I want to lay before the Senate some expressions of opinion upon that subject.

As is generally known the Interstate Commerce Commission have taken very extended testimony upon the subject of the control of corporations. They made a very elaborate report on that some three years ago, the testimony of which covers, I believe, some 3,000 pages. In those hearings there was constant reiteration by men representing various different fields of activity of the necessity of in some way having the business men of the country arrive at what trade agreements they could be allowed legally without detriment to the public interest to enter into. I wish to refer just briefly to some of the opinions that were there expressed and to show by whom they were expressed. There was a very carefully prepared digest made of that testimony, and in quoting from it I am going to quote from the digest for the sake of brevity and not from the original testimony.

We have the testimony of Mr. Seth Low, who is president of the National Civil Federation. He says he does not believe it possible under modern trade conditions to continue business without trade agreements. He is in favor of a trade commission for the purpose or regulating these agreements, and he goes on to say:

Such agreements affecting prices and output should be filed with the Interstate Trade Commission (suggested above), and be lawful as soon as filed, and continue so until declared by the commission to be contrary to the policy of the Sherman law; would also provide that all agreements affecting prices and output not filed with the commission shall be unlawful. Agreements should be permitted, if filed with the commission, which will prevent unfair and unreasonable competition—competition not intended to advance business, but to destroy competitors.

We have the testimony of Mr. Taylor Vinson, a lawyer and coal operator of Huntington, W. Va., on this same subject of trade agreements. He says:

The commission should have power to pass upon and approve reasonable trade agreements between competitors, which would restrain and limit competition within certain bounds (77), i. e., agreements providing for a joint selling or purchasing agency, or to supply each other with any of the means or methods of carrying on their business, or for the purchase or sale of their plants, or parts thereof, or property used in conducting their business, whenever in the judgment of such commission such trade agreements will not unreasonably restrict or limit competition, nor raise prices beyond what may be justified by the supply and demand, nor authorize competitors making such agreements to engage in unfair methods of competition against other competitors not parties thereto (73–74).

Believes such agreements necessary to permit economical management, and that under the present law the small man will be forced into bankruptcy (30–32).

Mr. Samuel Untermyer also testified in regard to trade agreements that—

The country is now honeycombed with secret verbal agreements and understandings which are not being reached by the Sherman law and can not be (182, 183, 214). People can not be kept from protecting themselves when the point of ruin is reached. The country must choose between proper regulation and secret defiance of law (182, 183). Trade agreements should be permitted for limited periods when an industry has become unprofitable (189–190) if the prices fixed by the agreements do not allow an unreasonable profit and do not unduly restrict production.

In regard to competition Mr. Untermyer said:

If combinations of capital are to be broken up, unrestrained competition can not be restored. Unrestrained competition in these days is a figment of the imagination. There must be some point at which cooperation can be permitted, but under Federal supervision.

Another witness, Mr. A. F. Thomas, of Lynchburg, Va., says:

Parties engaged in interstate commerce should be permitted to enter into agreements as to the purchase and sale of commodities and as to the prices and terms of such purchases and sales, provided that the full terms of such agreements should first be filed with and receive the approval of such bureau; and further, that the bureau should make public all such agreements. These agreements are subject to review and withdrawal upon 30 days' notice at the option of either the bureau of the parties (989).

Trade agreements are necessary to the successful application of the cooperative principle.

Mr. Henry B. Joy, who was the president of the Packard Motor Car Co., and I think is to-day, says:

TRADE AGREEMENTS.

Agreements by manufacturers engaged in the same line of business, fixing prices of products, should be permitted under the approval and supervision of the Government (1306–1307). This would preserve the weaker manufacturers who would otherwise have to go out of business, and prevent the economic loss attendant on such business failures (1308).

Mr. Emerson McMillan, of 40 Wall Street, New York, says:

Favor the continuance of any trade agreements that were filed with the commission until annulled by the commission or restrained by the court.

Mr. Edgar H. Farrar, who was formerly president of the American Bar Association (pp. 1485–1536, 2535–2538):

Does not believe that it comports with the sound public policy or the economic policy of any country that competition should be carried to the point of destruction, and therefore an agreement between persons in the same line of business to the effect that prices should not be cut below the actual cost of production ought to be considered a valid agreement (1487).

* * * * * * *

He would allow agreements providing for common selling agencies.

Mr. S. P. Bush, president Buckeye Steel Castings Co., Columbus, Ohio, says:

Would recommend the legalizing of trade agreements, to the end that those engaged in any industry may cooperate to avoid destructive competition, which includes unfair competition as well as competition that does not have an unlawful purpose.

Mr. Walter S. Bogle, coal operator, 808 Fisher Building, Chicago, Ill., representing the coal industry of Indiana:

Believes that the Sherman law is gradually bringing about the very condition of affairs that it was enacted to prevent. Because of their inability to have a common selling agency with a committee that would from time to time fix the price of their output, small operators have been compelled to cease operations, and in one case, at least, the mines were bought up by a single corporation, which, of course, resulted in the very thing which the individual operators could not do. The object of the law seems to be to compel unbridled competition, which in the coal business, in times of depression, overcapacity, or overproduction, spells disastrous competition (2321, 2322).

He believes that the coal operators, either in certain districts, or in certain States, should be permitted so to arrange their production as not to flood the market and so to arrange their selling that coal would bring at least cost and a fair return on the investment.

Mr. President, there are several other of these statements taken from the testimony before the committee at that time. I shall not read them, but ask to have them printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THORNTON in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Gary, Elbert H., chairman board of directors United States Steel Corporation (pp. 693–732, 811–850, 2407–2421):

TRADE AGREEMENTS.

There are cases where a corporation ought to have the right to make agreements with other corporations to maintain a certain price, a commission having the right to determine whether the agreement would or would not be an undue restraint of trade. (727–729.)

Brooks, T. J., Farmers' Educational Cooperative Union, Atwood, Tenn. (pp. 2336–2353):

SHERMAN LAW.

If the Sherman law could by technical construction be held to apply to such organizations as the Farmers' Educational Cooperative Union, such provisions should be eliminated; and if amendments of the law are passed, they should exempt farmers' unions from its operation (2337).

OBJECTS OF THE FARMERS' UNION.

The purpose of the Farmers' Union is to facilitate the marketing of crops according to the normal operation of the law of supply and demand; that is, the farmers themselves, by cooperation, desire to assume the carrying function and gradually market their crops, especially cotton and wheat, as the demand requires throughout the year.

Traer, G. W., representing the Illinois Coal Operators' Association, of Chicago, Ill. (pp. 2353–2372, 2556–2557):

ADVANTAGES OF COOPERATION OF OPERATORS.

Numerous advantages would result from cooperation among operators with a view to reducing the cost of producing and distributing the coal and maintaining the properties. Such methods would be beneficial to the general public in that better conservation of the coal would result. It is practically impossible, however, to effect any improvement in production and distribution without lessening to some extent destructive competition, although the cooperation necessary to effect these advantages need not, and should not, be permitted to go to the extent of fixing or arbitrarily controlling prices or limiting output.

It should be recognized that just as unreasonable combination leads to no competition, so no combination leads to unreasonable competition, which without regulation destroys itself and leads to consolidated ownership in very large units, with tremendous and ominous financial power rather than increased efficiency (2358). Large corporations are accused of unfair conduct because they sell below cost for the purpose of ruining competitors. Unless they submit to slower ruin themselves the law leaves them no other avenue of correction (2361).

Callbreath, J. F., secretary American Mining Congress, Denver, Colo. (pp. 2372–2380, 2431–2448):

CONDITIONS IN THE BITUMINOUS COAL-MINING INDUSTRY.

These facts show the dangerous conditions in the industry. They result in an enormous loss of life, and almost criminal waste of resources, and a business condition bordering on despair among the smaller producers (2372). The continuance of such conditions can not result in any good to the country (2373).

COMMISSION.

The commission should be authorized to approve in advance agreements by which economies may be effected (2434); to say in advance what is a reasonable combination (2435).

The authority of the commission would be to practically license the conduct of business under any agreement, and when, as the result of an investigation begun on its own initiative or upon complaint, it determines that any practice is contrary to the public welfare, to revoke the license or withdraw the authority, and leave the parties liable under the Sherman law.

Taylor, S., president of the American Mining Congress and representing the Pittsburgh Coal Operators' Association (pp. 2380–2407):

CONDITIONS IN THE BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY.

The average number of days worked per man per year in the mining of coal in 1910 was 217. This is a hardship on the miners. At the present price of coal the operators are compelled to leave at least 25 per cent of the coal in the mines, as to bring it out would cost more than can be obtained for it.

ECONOMIES TO BE EFFECTED BY COMBINATION.

(1) Reduction in the cost of marketing by handling the coal of a district through a central sales agency (2383). Such an agency should have, probably, power to distribute the sales proportionately among the mines represented (2387). The ordinary commissions paid to handlers of coal now run from 7 to 10 cents per ton. The very large companies handle their output for about 4 cents. A substantial saving could probably, therefore, be effected through a central agency (2383, 2384).

(2) Reduction in the cost of power by the joining of a number of operators in the maintenance of a common power plant.

(3) Reduction, through a central agency or some single person representing a number of operators, of transportation costs. A trainload of coal going from the Pittsburgh district to Chicago now may be made up from half a dozen different mines, and the added trouble in assembling the cars makes the total transportation cost more than if the whole trainload went from a single mine. If some agency had the orders, and it were seen that those from Chicago would total a trainload, it would be taken from one or two mines, resulting in a substantial saving in the cost of transportation (2383, 2384).

(4) Better prices, for instance, for slack, having a common storage plant and storing it until the winter, when a fair price may be obtained for it (2383, 2384).

(5) A substantial saving through a common agency for the purchase of materials, etc., used in the mine (2381).

COMMISSION.

Realizes that various consequences to the public might result if operators were permitted to combine, without restriction, to secure better prices and conditions in the industry. Suggests therefore that a commission be created, with power to review any proposed combination and refuse to permit it if in the judgment of the commission it was against the public interest. The jurisdiction of the commission should be plain, and the power to act on combinations without subjecting the persons forming such combinations to the Sherman law as it now stands (2382). Believes that under such a commission the privilege of combining could be conferred without its being abused (2386).

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, this is testimony which was given three years ago. In connection with this bill itself and with this present legislation there has also been a very considerable amount of testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I want to call attention to the fact that very competent witnesses are still testifying to the necessity of constructive action of this kind being taken on this subject.

Charles F. Mathewson, in reply to the views expressed by Dr. Van Hise (Pt. I, p. 65), said:

I would insert a clause at the end of the Sherman Act something like this, this being the substance: "This act is not intended, and shall not be construed, to prohibit any reasonable restraint of or any reasonable combination which may have the effect of eliminating or restraining competition, provided such elimination shall not be contrary to the public welfare."

Mr. S. P. Bush, president Ohio Manufacturers' Association, Columbus, Ohio, who I think testified three years ago, renewed his testimony at this time, saying:

But, nevertheless, the feeling is very profound that a certain amount of cooperative effort is absolutely necessary, and to eliminate all cooperation and make it unlawful for competitors even to attempt any cooperative effort would be a grave mistake. We fear that. If you ask us what we fear, that is one thing that we fear. We fear that we may, as things have been appearing, be discriminated against—the manufacturer and the business man. Not that we are anxious to stand in the way in the least of eradicating abuses, which we know of as well as you, probably better, but simply to protect in a national way industry, the product of labor, the product of capital.

To-day the situation is intensely uneconomic. It is wasteful. Competition is unnecessarily savage. The evil effects of it are coming to the surface every day.

There was recently held a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, on February 12, in Washington, at which a discussion of this subject was had by several men of very high standing. I should like to quote from some of those speeches, but instead I shall ask that the quotations which I have drawn off be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Speech of Victor Morawetz, delivered at second annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Washington, February 12, 1914 (p. 34):

However, it is not true that every contract or combination which in any degree lessens competition, or limits production, or increases prices restrains or tends to restrain trade or monopolize it. On the contrary, some contracts and combinations of that character are necessary to secure economy and efficiency in production and in trade and to preserve strong and healthy competition at home and in foreign markets. If such contracts or combinations involve no elements of oppression of others, and if they do not put an end to healthy competition in any branch or trade or commerce, they should not be prohibited.

Frederick P. Fish, Chamber of Commerce speech (p. 50):

I can not help believing that when we have had a longer experience with our present industrial conditions and understand more clearly the necessities of the complex business situation of to-day, we shall modify the Sherman law at least to the extent of permitting the free natural growth of industrial enterprises and such agreements as to price maintenance and conditions of manufacture and sale as are reasonably necessary to secure a fair profit to producers, not of course in the interest of any class or grade of business or of business men but in that of the country and its citizens as a whole.

Henry R. Towne, Chamber of Commerce speech (p. 59):

INVESTIGATIONS.

If well framed, a law similar to the Canadian "combines investigation" act would be of immense benefit especially to the vast number of minor industries, the aggregate of which, both in volume of business and in number of persons engaged, far exceeds the aggregate of the so-called "trusts" or great corporations. Its aim should be not merely to permit, but to encourage, cooperation between small competitors.

Prof. Henry R. Seager, Chamber of Commerce speech (pp. 70–74):

It seems to me that there should be included in this bill a provision such as that recommended in the report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce from which I quote:

"There ought to be a way in which men in such a venture could submit their plan to the Government and inquiry made as to the legality of such a transaction; and if the Government was of the opinion that competitive conditions would not be substantially impaired, there should be an approval, and in so far as the lawfulness of the exact thing proposed is concerned there should be a decision, and if favorable to the proposal there should be an end to that particular controversy for all time."

* * * * * * *

If business men may not "make any agreement, enter into any arrangement, or arrive at any understanding by which they, directly or indirectly, undertake to prevent a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or among any purchasers or consumers in the sale, production, or transportation of any product, article, or commodity" without rendering themselves liable to conviction for crime and to the severe penalties provided by the antitrust act, current methods of carrying on business in the United States will, indeed, have to undergo a modification.

* * * * * * *

But let us not make a fetish of competition! It also has its bad as well as its good side. While recognizing its value and making strenuous efforts to insure it a fair field for its operation, let us not ignore the fact that cooperation also has its legitimate place. On a higher moral plane than competition, its extension, under conditions that compel adequate regard to the public interest, must prove advantageous not only to business men, but to the whole community.

George W. Wickersham's address before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Philadelphia, February 26, 1914 (pp. 10, 25, 26):

To legislate without discrimination against every agreement which directly or indirectly may restrict competition is to put an embargo upon all healthy normal business development.

* * * * * * * *

The problem of the relation of the Federal Government to cooperative industrial business can never be satisfactorily solved until Congress courageously legislates in the affirmative, declares what can be done, and throws the protection of the National Government about those who conform to its laws in acting under it.

* * * * * * * *

Negative action is cowardly and must in the future prove to be as unsatisfactory as it always has done in the past.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, one of the most intelligent of the witnesses who have discussed the question of trade agreements before the Interstate Commerce Committee is Dr. Charles Van Hise, of the University of Wisconsin. I should like to read what he has to say in regard to this matter.

The existing situation—

He says—

is not so much created by the existence of monopoly as by cooperation between organizations which are not monopolies themselves. I wish to assert that cooperation exists to an extent which is far beyond what is usually appreciated, and perhaps beyond what you yourselves are familiar with unless you have gone into the matter. I am quite sure that cooperation in various ways in regard to market and output and prices exists in substantially every business of the country, from the country crossroads to the great centers.

* * * * * * * *

It seems to me if we are really, therefore, going to the root of this situation we can only do it by recognizing the existence of cooperation in this country and regulating that cooperation.

* * * * * * * *

If there were time—but I know there is not—I believe I could cite instance after instance in which each and every member of this committee would agree that the proposed cooperation is entirely proper.

Dr. Van Hise occupies a very distinguished position. He has given this subject very careful thought and consideration for many years, and represents not the business view of this matter but the view of the economist and the student.

In order to show how strongly the demand exists for some legislation that will cover this question of trade agreements, I want to call attention to the results of the referendum which was undertaken on the part of a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, as illustrating the opinion of the merchants throughout this country on this subject. In the early part of June a committee representing that body asked for the views of the organizations which were included in it upon several questions and they made their recommendations on each question that was submitted to the chamber, in some cases in favor of it and in some cases opposing it. The subject of No. 3 was that:

The committee recommended that the commission—

Referring to the trade commission—should not now be given authority to advise applicants concerning the legality of proposed contracts, combinations, etc.

In other words, that the commission should not then be given any authority in the way of deciding upon the validity of trade agreements. The committee, as I say, recommended against the adoption of this resolution. Dr. Van Hise, however, who was a member of the committee, was very much in favor of it, and a short argument in favor of it was sent out with a proposal for votes. Every recommendation which the committee made to the chamber of commerce was approved in accordance with the opinion of the committee except this one proviso; and although the committee of the body themselves had advised against this approval of trade agreements by this commission, the votes of business organizations showed a vote of 307 in favor of such authority being given to a commission and a vote of 304 against it.

It is a slight majority, it is true, but inasmuch as that majority is made up in many cases by the votes of business men who have perhaps not given the subject the very fullest consideration, and is in opposition to the advice of their own committee, to my mind it is a very emphatic illustration of what the real opinion of the business men of this country on that proposition is.

Mr. President, I have tried to lay before the Senate a number of reasons why I believe that something ought to be done in the way of constructive legislation, why something ought to be done in the way of pointing out the path along which the business of the country might go ahead, as well as to have the barriers prescribed beyond which it must not pass.

I should like to say in connection with this matter that the United States is the only country in the world, so far as I know, that does not in some form or other authorize and approve and help cooperation among its people. In Germany they have the well-known cartel, and in 1892, under the system which they have, there were 450 authorized agreements. In Italy, while the system is not the same, they have an arrangement by which people can submit to the Government agreements which they want to make, and the agreements are authorized or not authorized, as the Government sees fit. In England business men are allowed to do things in the way of cooperation for the sake of economy and the proper conduct of business that we do not at present allow in this country.

Even at the present time the cotton spinners in Manchester have made an agreement by which they have put in force a curtailment of the production of all the mills, the agreement to be operative from the time at which it was put in force, a week or two ago, until the end of September, which means a partial reduction of their production for 10½ weeks, amounting to about 30 per cent of their running time.

I do not know that I have anything more to add to what I have already said on this question at the present time, but I have an amendment covering some of my views which I may bring up a little later in the day.

Mr. LIPPITT subsequently said:

In the course of the remarks I made a while ago, I meant to ask to have printed in connection with them an amendment which I intend to propose to meet some of the conditions in regard to trade agreements. I now ask that I may have permission to print the amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LIPPITT to the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

SEC. 5a. That if one or more parties to any agreement made or proposed to be entered into between two or more parties, one or more of whom is or are engaged in interstate commerce, or which agreement affects or is intended to affect interstate commerce, shall submit such agreement to the commission by filing with it a copy thereof, together with a duly verified statement, in writing, in such form as the commission shall prescribe, giving the names, occupations, and addresses of all parties to such agreement, stating whether the same has or has not been executed, the reasons therefor, and the effect, if any, which such agreement is intended to have upon interstate commerce, and such further information as the commission, by its rules, shall require, the commission shall forthwith consider such agreement, and the effect of the same, and may require any further information, documentary or otherwise, with regard thereto which in its judgment shall seem necessary or proper; and if all requests of the commission for information shall be promptly and fully complied with, it shall, with all convenient speed, make and file a certificate, stating whether or not, in its opinion, such agreement does or would operate in undue restraint of interstate commerce, or tend to the monopolization of any part of such commerce.

No party to any such agreement who shall have submitted or joined in the submission thereof to the commission, during the time the same is under consideration by the commission, shall be prosecuted criminally because of such agreement or any act done pursuant thereto, under the provisions of any of the antitrust laws. If the commission shall be of the opinion, and shall so certify in writing, that any existing agreement or combination is being operated in the interest of the public, and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that such operations will not substantially exclude, prevent, or reduce competition in the business affected thereby, then, so long as such certificate remains unrevoked or such agreement shall not have been declared unlawful or against the public interest by some court of competent jurisdiction, no party thereto shall be prosecuted criminally in any court of the United States because of such agreement or any act done pursuant thereto under the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

Upon reasonable notice to the parties to such agreement, given in such manner as the commission by its rules may prescribe, and after such parties shall have been given an opportunity to be heard with respect thereto, the commission may revoke any certificate made as aforesaid: Provided, however, That nothing in this section contained shall operate to prevent or otherwise affect the prosecution of any civil suit or action against the parties to any such agreement by the United States or by any other party.

TRANSPORTATION OF AMERICAN PRODUCTS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, while the United States Senate is talking, and talking in extenso, and while very many Senators are participating in the debate at unusual length, the whole world outside of the United States seems to have gone insane. The insanity, the idiocy, and the stupidity of war prejudice has seized the entire world, and, in the providence of God, it is thoroughly impossible for any part of the world to be engaged in devastating warfare without damaging the utmost other parts of the world.

We are faced to-day with a condition growing out of the European warfare that has led me to introduce a bill and will lead me in a few moments to ask unanimous consent that the bill be permitted to go to the proper committee for consideration.

America finds herself to-day in this situation: Our cotton crop, which was once pronounced by a premier of England to be the greatest "gold asset" in the world exeept gold itself, can not find transportation for exportation. That does not make so much difference, because the new crop of cotton as yet has not been picked and baled and is not ready for export, but the situation has produced almost a panic in southern centers. In New Orleans and in Memphis and in Galveston people are losing their heads. Cotton has gone off $10 a bale, and what that means to the American people, with 15,000,000 bales of a gold-returning cotton product, all of you can figure. Out of that 15,000,000 bales only 40 per cent is manufactured in the United States. Two-thirds of that entire product is manufactured in Great Britain and in Germany—in Great Britain more largely than in Germany.

So far as our trade with Great Britain is concerned, after a few weeks, or a few days possibly, that will be open and free. The German fleet will probably be bottled up in the Baltic, and not only the ships of neutral powers but the ships of the English nation will be free to sail the seas.

Meanwhile another thing of much more importance, not related to my section, is threatening the American people. Breadstuffs and meat stuffs, which are quasi contraband, are not exportable at this moment. Not long ago I read a report in the newspapers that the railroads were refusing to take shipments of wheat to Galveston, Tex., upon the ground that the elevators there were full of wheat, that there was no place to store it, and the railroads could not afford to take the wheat and keep it in their freight cars, because very soon it would use up their rolling stock; and besides, that was a pretty expensive way of storing and keeping wheat, as the railroads would have to provide the cars. Nobody can blame the railroads for that.

Here is all Europe, with foodstuffs rising in Paris, London, St. Petersburg, and Vienna to starvation prices, and here is America flushed with the biggest crop that she has ever made in her history, and the difficulty, so far as corn and oats and meat stuffs are concerned, is simply a question of transportation.

The Hague conference divided all products in times of war into three classes. One was "absolute contraband," in neutral bottoms or in any other bottoms, such as munitions of war and articles of that sort; another class was composed of food products, which were capable of being made contraband of war or not, according to the decision of the belligerent powers; another class of products was expressly declared to be noncontraband, and among these was raw cotton. The United States protested at The Hague against the idea of making foodstuffs even quasi contraband, but the decision went against us. They can be contraband in certain eventualities.

Now, what I want to do is this: It is not very important to the South just at this moment, because our new crop is not yet ready to move except in the interior, and not many bales of the new crop of cotton have been picked and ginned and put upon the market even in the interior. Outside of southeast Texas and southwest Louisiana and a little of the southern part of Mississippi and Alabama and Georgia and some parts of Florida, there are no new bales of cotton on the market.

The present fall of $10 a bale in cotton has been produced for purely speculative purposes, grounded upon anticipation of a decrease of demand from the European mills. Part of the decrease, in my opinion—and I am making this talk principally to spread a feeling of optimism throughout the South and to decrease the spirit of pessimism, so far as I possibly can—a part of that demand will, in my opinion, continue. The greatest customer for our raw cotton is Great Britain and, in my opinion, unless the British Navy is totally deficient and inefficient and unequal to its tonnage and its cannonage and everything else, it will not be long before the world will know that the German Navy, representing the only great world power that is intent upon war, determined upon it, and has been determined upon it for months, will be bottled up in the Baltic; and if it is bottled up in the Baltic or destroyed at sea, then not only will neutral ships sail the seas, but English ships will also keep their regular schedule time from New York to Liverpool and Southampton and other ports. Of course American ships can not be interfered with at all; but for the immediate future, in order to take care of foodstuffs, breadstuffs, meat stuffs, and those things we have got to have transportation.

So I have drawn up a bill, which I will take the liberty of reading to the Senate, and for which I am going to ask unanimous consent simply that it shall be introduced and referred to the committee, as unanimous consent is necessary under the present order.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase outright for cash, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, any ships belonging to citizens or subjects of belligerent powers now lying in American ports, or hereafter brought thereinto, paying for them not more than their true value, ascertained upon a system of appraisal to be instituted and published by him; that in the purchase of them due regard be had to our Atlantic, Pacific, and Mexican Gulf needs—

So that the shipping may be distributed between the wheat and the tobacco, and the cotton, and the sugar ports—that officers and crews of the Navy be detailed to man them, or officers and crews of our merchant marine be employed to man them, or officers and crews fit for the service being two-thirds American citizens be otherwise secured.

SEC. 2. That these ships be at the earliest available moment admitted by authority of this act to American registry.

SEC. 3. That the ships so manned and registered be loaded with breadstuffs, meats, and cotton, and other articles not contraband of war, ready now or hereafter ready for export, and shall convey the same to whomsoever at whatever port of the world may have purchased the same, subject only to blockades that are or may be declared.

Of course, if any of these powers declare blockades, all sorts of merchandise, whether contraband of war or not—even diamonds or silk—may be subject to seizure if caught in ships running the blockade.

SEC. 4. That the United States view as an unfriendly act any attempt on the part of any Government, dominion, or power in the world to interfere with, hinder, or delay their commerce on the high seas, in anything save absolute contraband of war—

Now, remember, foodstuffs were not pronounced by The Hague conference to be "absolute" contraband of war. They were pronounced to be quasi and conditional contraband of war, depending upon the belligerent conditions.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator think it necessary to put that last clause in this bill? Does not that look a little like putting a chip on our shoulder before we have any occasion to do so?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not afraid of that chip, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not see the necessity for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, I am not afraid of that chip. This is the first time in a long time, peace fanatic as I am and acknowledge myself to be, that I am not afraid of carrying the chip. Peace fanatic as I am, when a man spits tobacco juice in my eyes I am going to resent it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But they have not done it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My position is this: The American commerce in breadstuffs and meat stuffs must find its way to Europe in behalf of the interest of the American people. I am not in the slightest degree afraid even of Kaiser Wilhelm himself issuing any pronunciamento in opposition to whatever we do within our rights—and that is within our rights—because The Hague Conference left indefinite the question as to whether foodstuffs were or were not to be contraband of war. It left it to be determined by the powers at the time.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. O'GORMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield, and to whom?

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment, if the Senators will pardon me. All powers in Europe are at one another's throats.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They have not done that yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are at one another's throats. I am sorry for it. Insanity, idiocy, stupidity are weak terms for men who will bring on international war. It is the people—the mechanics, the farmers, the husbands, the brothers, the sweethearts in those classes—that suffer. The German Junkerthum that has brought on this war will suffer least of all people in Europe, unless the German Empire is speedily whipped. Cooperating with Austria, forming a compact territory with contiguous boundaries, with interior lines of communication, with superior discipline, with superior mobilization, with superior scientific war methods, the chance of their being whipped is rather remote. Germany's antagonists must go all around everywhere in the world to cooperate for a strike, while the Austrian and Prussian armies—I say "Prussian," because Prussia is the dominating influence with the Junkerthum of all Germany—have the opportunity to strike upon interior lines. There is, however, just one thing that none of them want piled on their backs right now, and that is the United States of America.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to ask the Senator, because I have not looked into this matter very closely, whether or not the question of foodstuffs becoming contraband of war is dependent upon the action of the individual country; that is, could England declare foodstuffs contraband of war, or Germany, or any other country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not depend upon any concert of action?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it depends upon the individual country, and the action of that individual country will depend upon our action.

Mr. GALLINGER. Largely so, no doubt.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if we say at the beginning of this thing that food shall not be contraband of war, not one of them will dare make it so—not one of them—unless it were, probably, Great Britain, and her friendly relations toward the United States in very many respects are such that she would not want to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think, if the Senator will yield to me, that there need be no feeling about this matter at all. I am quite in sympathy with the purpose the Senator has in view, which is, as I understand, to secure unanimous consent to his offering a bill which is to be reported to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but I want to read the bill first, and I wanted to make this little talk, because I want the press and I want the intelligence bureaus of the country to carry what I regard as the optimism of this speech to all the country, and to the South especially.

Now I will continue with the reading of the bill:

SEC. 4. That the United States view as an unfriendly act any attempt on the part of any Government, Dominion, or power in the world to interfere with, hinder, or delay their commerce on the high seas, in anything save absolute contraband of war, as declared by The Hague conference or in obedience to blockade regulations—

That is where I was interrupted, in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait one moment.

And especially any attempt to interfere with, delay, or hinder their commerce as carried on in the ships hereby provided for.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wanted to ask the Senator whether he did not believe that position and statement ought to come from the State Department, rather than in a bill passed by Congress?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is possibly true.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to oppose the Senator's idea as contained in the bill, but I do believe that a statement of that kind ought to come from our State Department and not in a bill passed by Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My idea was that the State Department ought to have the encouragement of the legislative department to take that position. All I want is to refer this bill to the committee, and if the committee changes it in any respect so that it meets the substantial object in view I shall not be ugly about it, and shall make no objection. My idea was that if the legislative branch of the Government of the United States, representing the people in a peculiar way, wanted to express its opinion, it would be bolstering up and backing up the executive department of the Government to take that position, and even if this clause were stricken out of the bill the general remarks upon it and its purpose would to a large extent have that effect.

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury—

Now, of course, I do not want to put this sort of thing into permanent operation. That would be absurd. I do not want the United States Government engaging in the transportation business. All of you who know me know that there is not a man in this body more opposed to that than I am. So I have added this section:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before or within four months after peace shall have been reestablished in Europe, to dispose of the ships purchased under this act at the best available price at public or private sale, and to cover the proceeds thereof into the general fund of the Treasury.

My opinion is that even during this war private capital will come forward ready to repurchase from the American Government these ships at the full price which has been paid for them, because of the immense profits accruing to the neutral carrying trade in a great European war.

In that connection I want to say this: I have heard gentlemen say that the war would be over in 60, 90, or 120 days. I do not believe it. I am one of the few men who are decently informed who do not believe it. I notice the Boer War took three years to finish. Will gentlemen tell me that with all the modern improvements in the instruments of warfare this war will be suddenly terminated and peace will immediately follow it? That depends upon the spirit of the people behind the war. Germany and Austria have interior lines of communication and contiguous boundaries, and are compact, and will undoubtedly gain the first advantages in this war; but if the French people are prepared to die instead of being prepared to surrender 80,000 men, as they did at Sedan in the last Franco-Prussian War, and if the Russian people are tied to the death by blood relationship to Servia, and determine that she shall not be crushed by Austria like an empty eggshell, this war may go on for seven years. Nobody knows. No man can tell. No man ought to be egotistical enough or foolish enough even to attempt to prophesy. Therefore I put in this last section.

Now, not intending to keep the Senate any longer than is absolutely necessary, I want to say just one or two more words, because I want them to go into the RECORD, and I want them to go to my constituents, who have a certain degree of confidence in me, in a way—in my sincerity, at any rate—wherever else there may be failings.

I believe that the entire American people, and the South especially, are overestimating the damage that is going to be done to the United States by this insane, idiotic, stupid performance in Europe. As far as the West is concerned, the moment this transportation difficulty is overcome her products are going to rise to war prices upon European markets wherever they can be landed, wherever they are not excluded by blockades; and if we take this position blockaded places will be the only places where they are excluded; that is, where blockades have been declared by belligerent powers. Now, as far as cotton is concerned, it is a part of the misfortune of the South that whenever a war occurs anywhere in the world cotton must go down. Going to the ultimate consumer, where he makes his first economy is in his clothing.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not now. Man must eat; man must live; and man must have foodstuffs day by day. He can not economize upon that; and seven-tenths of mankind do not buy any more foodstuffs in peace times than they need. They can not cut it off much; but when it comes to clothing, the man says: "Well, I will do without a new suit." The wife says: "I will do without a new dress." They can economize, and so calicos and other dress clothing fall; and they say: "Well, never mind if the old sheet has a hole in it; put it back on the bed anyhow. We have not got money enough to buy a new one right now without troubling us." So shirtings and sheetings and everything else goes down, and raw cotton out of which to make them especially does. The only time when war can help the price of cotton is when the semi or quasi monopolistic cotton section of the United States is itself involved in a war. Then, of course, the transportation of cotton abroad is interfered with by blockades and cotton may rise, as it did in Manchester during the war between the States, to $1.50 a pound.

Mr. WEST. That was the point I was expecting to raise when the Senator made the remark.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right. I am mighty glad I made it, because I have more confidence in it after I know the Senator wanted it.

So far as the balance of the United States is concerned, although no part of the world can possibly be permanently helped by warfare and bloodshed and devastation of property in any of the balance of the world, it will be helped temporarily. As far as we are concerned in the South, in the cotton belt, of course cotton must suffer a certain loss, because outside of the ultimate consumer's economy is the fact that the male help in the factories of Germany and France will be put in uniforms. Germany takes some 300,000 bales of cotton per month from the United States, and France about 175,000 bales per month. I mean during the cotton season, which lasts about three or four months. There is, however, one good thing that I want to mention to the people of the United States, and those in the South especially, about cotton factories which in ordinary times is a bad thing, but in war times is a good thing: Most of the help in the cotton factories is women and children—children over 16 or over 14 or whatever the local laws are, and the women—and they will not be pressed into war. It is not like a steel factory, where perhaps every man may have to go out from the furnaces to put on a Prussian uniform in Germany, or to put on some other uniform somewhere else.

Now, I want the people, if they can, to hold their heads and not get excited. In every great crisis that comes people come to you, and their first cry is, "More money!" We have plenty of money, ready to be distributed. As my old grandfather used to say, "I never saw the time when there was too little money. I have frequently seen the time when there was too little collateral." We have provided a banking system, and by this amendment which the House has sent over and by the agreement which comes out of conference we have made the broadest possible provision for depositing live, valuable, commercial assets and getting currency for them.

I want the country to understand, as far as my weak voice can impress it upon the country, and especially upon my own section and State, that there is no reason to grow panicky at all; that when this great, foolish, stupid blunder of war is over the United States will come out, with the Red, White, and Blue flying, as the only country on the globe of any importance that had sense enough to keep its head. Even a nation needs a head. Now and then, when I am fooling along here in Washington, I think maybe it has too many heads, and that they are not quite so good as they ought to be; but even a nation needs a head. It needs what Jonathan Bourne called a composite head, or it needs a certain definite head; but, at any rate, it needs brains and intellect; and the great thing is for the country not to get excited, not to imagine that everything is going to pieces.

If you could take the cotton crop to-day and carry it over by a system of valorization, as Brazil did with her coffee; if you carried the surplus over to the next year and the war lasted six months or one year, and this surplus were thereby piled upon the market at the end of the next crop as an increased supply somewhere to sell, plus the next year's production; and if the acreage would be increased by holding out the hope of valorization, then, at the end of the entire struggle of two or three years you might have cotton worth 4, 5, or 6 cents a pound. So the thing is simply to hold our head and be calm and be deliberate, to love peace, and to remember this, and with that I shall conclude and shall ask unanimous consent.

What I hate about war is not the men who are killed—they can be reproduced; it is not the number of women who starve to death—and I have seen it when I was a boy—for they can be reproduced; it is only a question of a generation or so. What I hate about it is that every dollar that is taken out and literally burned up in powder and cannon and uniforms is subtracted from churches and schools and agriculture and scientific research and educational enrichment and from the great philanthropic social activities of every description which in time of peace push men forward. There never was a people yet who went through a war without losing, not dollar for dollar on account of this subtraction, but two dollars for one; because it is not only the dollar that is subtracted, but it is the other dollar taken out of the pocket of the citizen for war or economy purposes, where he might have been producing something instead of wearing the uniform. That makes it at least 2 to 1.

If I were to go out of the Senate door right now and attack the Senator from New Hampshire and pull a pistol upon him and he were to pull one upon me, it would be less idiotic and less insane and less stupid and asinine than this war in Europe is right now. What do they say they are quarreling about? Because an archduke was assassinated by a fanatic. You and I know that that is not the case. Everybody knows that. I am a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I reckon I ought not to be too blunt in my speech about what is taking place abroad. Being a United States Senator, somebody might think it was a sort of a semiofficial utterance that I had no right to make, and I shall not go any further along that line. But what hurts me about it all is this: I have lived and seen. Take me myself. I belong to a family of large people. Every boy I have except one is over 6 feet tall. My ancestors were. You people starved me to death when I was growing, and starved my brother in the same way. So you stunt everything. You stunt education; you stunt religion; you stunt social progress; you stunt hospitality; you stunt international inter-relationship, which is a very precious thing; and the whole thing is just simply—oh, I do not know. I can not find language to express what I think about it, because I know of no stronger words than I have already used. If I knew any, I would use them.

The thing for the people of the United States to do is to keep their heads cool and their hearts warm in charity and sympathy for all these poor people—farmers, mechanics, factory workers—who will have to bear abroad the burden of idiotic war. The Junkerthum of Prussia and the Reichsrath and the Corps Legislatif and the Austrian Assembly and the British Parliament will not have one man out of forty hurt.

I think if there were a law that whenever war was declared every member of the legislative assembly declaring it must go to the front in the first rank, there would be less war than we have now; and, besides that, we would get a lot of fools killed, which would be a great advantage to the civilized world—war fools especially. I have no sympathy with them.

I have read the bill and I have stated the reason for introducing it, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (S. 6214) to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the approval of the President of the United States, to purchase certain ships, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. JONES. I have an amendment which I intend to propose to House bill 18202, which passed the House yesterday. I ask permission to offer it and have it printed and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. A similar amendment has already been by unanimous consent offered to-day and referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD (H. DOC. NO. 1137).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

After further consideration of the existing condition in Europe, in so far as it is affecting citizens of the United States who are there without means, financial or otherwise, to return to their homes in this country, it seems incumbent upon the Government to take steps at once to provide adequate means, by the chartering of vessels or otherwise, of bringing Americans out of the disturbed region and conveying them to their homes in the United States. Moreover, in view of the difficulty of obtaining money upon letters of credit, with which most Americans abroad are supplied, it will be necessary to send agents abroad with funds, which can be advanced on such evidences of credit or used for the assistance of destitute citizens of the United States.

In these circumstances I recommend the immediate passage by the Congress of an act appropriating $2,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed at the disposal of the President for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens and for personal services, rent, and other expenses which may be incurred in the District of Columbia or elsewhere connected with or growing out of the existing disturbance in Europe.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 4, 1914.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House and insist on the bill as passed by the Senate, that it request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes, and that the conferees on behalf of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming conferees on the part of the Senate.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy and in entire accord with the object which the authors of this bill say that they seek to obtain. On the other hand, however, I have but little confidence in the methods which they have adopted to obtain that object. The bill will no doubt pass with all its indirection and lack of virility, and I, among others, who had hoped for better things along these lines, will be compelled to vote for it. May God have mercy on our souls. With all due and commensurate respect for it and its authors, I and others who had hoped for something better for the people of this country find ourselves situated as was Dean Swift, who was by circumstances over which he had no control forced to dine at the house of a notorious skinflint, when called upon to ask a blessing upon the meagre fare set before him, and did so by saying, "For what we are about to receive, O Lord, make us correspondingly grateful."

So far as I have been able to ascertain, no two of the many able attorneys in the Senate are able to agree on what this bill means or what it will accomplish if it becomes a law. After carefully listening to many of the arguments, both for and against it, I have come to the conclusion that if it is going to require of the business men of this country the time to guess out its meaning which has been consumed here in explaining it, it is too involved in that respect to be worth enacting into a law.

The reason for this difficulty with it, I think, is due to the fact that it attempts to remedy certain evils in a half-hearted manner and by adopting indirect methods instead of boldly grasping the subject and administering the treatment which will accomplish the desired result.

There are certain existing evils which have been fastened upon the people of this country which are sapping its prosperity and which will ultimately destroy or permanently cripple it if they are not removed. These evils and the cause for their existence are apparent and well known, and it seems to me that out of the large number of able attorneys who are Members of this body some one could be found to formulate a measure, simple and effective, which would declare the fraud and the theft which is being practiced upon the people of this country to be unlawful and to provide penalties for the same.

The time for the enactment of some such simple measure which will give relief from continued acts of injustice and downright dishonesty which mulct the people out of hundreds of millions of dollars each year, is long overdue, and no temporizing measures which fall short of accomplishing the result or which indirectly authorize the agents of the people to enter into negotiations and exchanges of visits and views with the crooks who are engaged in looting their principals is going to relieve the situation or be looked upon by them either with approval or without suspicion.

The passage of a measure under the terms of which any and every small and honorable dealer may be put to intentional and infinite annoyance or driven out of business by his larger or more crafty rival and from which he has everything to fear and nothing to gain, whereas, upon the other hand, intrenched, dishonest business interests, through negotiations, may have their methods pronounced to be not too unreasonably unfair, and have everything to gain and nothing to lose by taking a chance on befuddling a commission with countless definitions of fair and unfair competition, will but add delay to the solution of a question that presses for an answer.

Unmuzzled criminals who are engaged in robbing other and better people should be estopped and dealt with as are other and less harmful thieves.

If commissions are to be appointed to ponder upon and weigh the exact amount of unfairness which is involved in extortions whereby unfortunate mothers and helpless children are made to suffer from lack of a sufficient supply of bread and other simple food supplies, and in consequence of the far-reaching effects of similar illy balanced economic conditions some scores of little babies die within the circle of a mile from this Chamber of much talk and dilatory methods, I see no reason why a board of supervisors should not be created with whom the more merciful porch climbers, pickpockets, yegg and "stick-up" men might be allowed to consult in order to receive due and respectful consideration as to the ultimate benefits and disadvantages which accrues to society at large in the ultimate analysis from the carrying on of their chosen professions.

If it be true that hundreds of thousands and millions of people in this country are being compelled to accept arbitrarily fixed and unjustly low prices for the products of their toil, while at the same time they and others on the other hand are also being compelled to pay arbitrarily fixed and unjustly high prices for what they consume, they are being robbed, and it would be well to say so by act of Congress in place of setting a commission to work hunting down individual and probably lesser examples of a general and well-established evil. Sooner or later this social cancer which is eating into the body politic must be destroyed and palliatives and placebos will only serve to kill time during which the evil growth will secure a deeper hold.

To delegate the sovereign power of Congress to a commission which will be drafted from God knows where will not only lead to unending delay but will add an enormous expense to a long-suffering and already overburdened people.

Commissions of the kind here contemplated are in no wise responsible for their acts to the people, yet the people are to be bound by their decisions. They are suffering now from the decisions respecting business methods by persons whom Congress allows to prey upon them and has failed to make responsible to them for their predatory acts, and under this bill a commission which may be entirely in sympathy and harmony with such predatory interests is to be placed over them in a position where they can make and enforce a mandate that the people of this country shall continue to be robbed as they are now being robbed, and by the same set of criminals.

If it were so constituted there might come from it decisions which would definitely fix upon them some of the most oppressive practices under which they are now struggling. This is a danger that no wise man can afford to overlook in considering his vote upon this bill. This country has had experience with officials who have been more than tender to the interests of those who sought special privileges at the expense of the people; in fact, there would be no need of the present attempted legislation or any other of a similar character if such had not been its experience, and as a Nation we are yet in our youth.

This measure, if it becomes a law, will set upon foot a set of investigations into the details of business which, if they should be deflected into minor channels among small traders, might go on indefinitely without ever reaching the larger and more dangerous combinations which have secured a strangle hold on the food locker of every poor family in this country.

The possibilities for unlimited investigations and paucity of results which can be carried on at the expense of the people under its grant of powers in that respect reminds me of the rather simple but effective plan which is sometimes adopted by nurses to keep a restless baby quiet while she devotes her time to something aside from what she is being paid for doing. She smears a little adhesive, such as is spread on fly paper, on each of the baby's index fingers and then places a nice fluffy feather on one of them. That is all that is necessary; when she has done that, "the game is made," and her attention to that infant is no longer required. The misguided and bamboozled baby instantly drops everything else and gravely reaches out to pick the feather off that finger with the other hand, and, of course, the feather is transferred to it. Just why it should make any difference to a baby, or anyone else, upon which hand a feather was stuck I have never been able to ascertain. I only know that for an hour at a stretch a baby, with all the solemnity which a trades commission sitting in judgment in the effort to ascertain whether a man had taken an unfair advantage of his competitor by crossing his honey bees with lightning bugs in order that they might gather honey at night, while those of his competitor were asleep, could bring to bear on that problem, will transfer the feather from the one hand to the other, back and forth, entirely oblivious to its surroundings or creature comforts, until it drops to sleep from exhaustion.

It is a simple little trick, which succeeds for the reason that it fixes the attention of the child and attracts it away from the real game; and inasmuch as it at all times promises success and as it every time almost, but not quite, succeeds, it works wonders. I do not wish to suggest that the present bill has been designedly drawn with intent to create a device to divert the attention of the people from their real needs, but by some freak of fate it will more nearly, in my opinion, accomplish that than any other result.

I have had experience with multiple boards and commissions in the conduct of public business, and I would deplore the creation of more of them than we now have in carrying on the affairs of this Nation. There is about them a division of authority and lack of responsibility and cohesion which is fatal to success. In fact, the creation of commissions is a confession of weakness on the part of a people in conducting their affairs, and I do not think that this country has reached that stage, although I feel free to confess that I may be mistaken. In fact, it has been tried out in nearly every municipality in this country, and the affairs of the people have been vested in various and divers boards, and always it has resulted simply in loss and mismanagement, or at least in careless oversight and general bad government. The loss, I would estimate, would average anywhere from 25 to 30 per cent of all public moneys expended. Many cities, having found that it was a failure, have dissolved all their commissions and placed their entire affairs in the hands of a single commission. In the time yet to come in the management of municipal affairs, I prophesy that they will go further than that; they will vest all executive power in the hands of one trusted public official at the head of their municipal government.

The legislative power will be given into the hands of a carefully selected few honorable gentlemen, and then reserving in the hands of the people the right to recall all of these officials at any time if their affairs are not carried on successfully, they will get speedy results, direct action, and save a large loss of time and money.

If these powers which are being vested upon a commission were placed in the hands of the Attorney General or some specially designated officer, and he were given sufficient power to carry on the work, the people of this country would get direct benefit; or if they did not, they would know who was responsible. As it is in this bill, there will be a commission of five; one or two of them will be wise men and one or two more of them will not be so wise; some will have views of one kind and others of another, the same as the views are divergent here in this body. It will be slow work and hard work to convince them all as to the proper course to pursue to get them to take speedy action.

I look for no immediate or for no very good results. Although I think the intention of the authors in drawing this measure was good, yet I think they have had but little experience with the management of public affairs at the hands of commissions, or they would not have created one to do this work.

I have purposely made these remarks for the reason that I wish to place myself upon record. I expect to be compelled to vote for this bill, for the reason that there will be nothing better offered; yet I want it known to my fellow Members that I do so only for that reason, and that I have all along hoped that some able attorney here would draw a direct, a simple, and a concise measure which would declare these frauds which are being practiced upon the people, and they are worse than frauds, to be unlawful, and then provide a penalty for committing them, and place them definitely in the hands of the Attorney General, and then add a clause holding that very worthy official responsible to the people of this country if he did not perform his duty.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Bristow	James	O'Gorman	Sterling
Bryan	Johnson	Overman	Stone
Burton	Jones	Owen	Sutherland
Camden	Kenyon	Page	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kern	Perkins	Thomas
Chilton	Lane	Pittman	Thompson
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Reed	Vardaman
Crawford	McCumber	Saulsbury	Walsh
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Weeks
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	West
Fall	Myers	Simmons	White
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to announce the temporary absence of my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] from the Chamber.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I wish to state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is detained by official business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] on account of sickness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

TRANSFER OF VESSELS FROM COASTWISE TRADE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that we are working under a rule that prevents the introduction of other business, but unanimous consent has several times been given to-day for that purpose, and I have a simple Senate resolution relating to a matter which has come from the other House which is very important. I ask unanimous consent that I may offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. I send to the desk a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 436), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby directed to make careful inquiry into the possibility of securing vessels now engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States for transfer to the foreign trade, with a view to meeting the present emergency in over-seas transportation, report to be made to the Senate at the earliest practicable day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask leave to report a bill at this time, and ask that it go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the report will be received.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 166) authorizing the President to designate two officers connected with the Public Health Service to represent the United States at the Sixth International Sanitary Conference of American States, to be held at Montevideo, Uruguay, in December, 1914, and making an appropriation to pay the expenses of said representatives, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to go into the bill immediately following section 5 and to be known as section 6. Of course that contemplates the renumbering of the succeeding sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, to stand as section 6 and to read as follows:

SEC. 6. The term "unfair competition" as used in section 5 is hereby defined to embrace all those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices done or used with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, no one knows better than myself that I have taken too much of the Senate's time in discussing the various propositions involved in this bill; no one more than myself regrets that fact; but this is one of the most important measures that has been before Congress in many years. It makes a radical change in our laws. It embarks us on new seas.

The amendment I have offered I earnestly ask consideration for. For a number of days during the debate it was conceded by the authors of this bill that the only reason they had not defined the term "unfair competition" was because they had been unable to write a definition sufficiently broad in its terms to embrace the practices they desired to prohibit. Repeatedly I was challenged by the distinguished chairman of the committee reporting the bill to write such a definition, and at least the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] challenged my good faith because I had not written such a definition.

I appreciate the difficulty of defining the thought which is in the minds of those who are pushing this bill. While I do not claim for it perfection, I contend, however, that the definition now submitted does define with reasonable accuracy and certainty the practices which it is desired to prohibit. I maintain that unless we do place this definition or some other definition in this statute, it is extremely likely that the statute will be held not to at all cover the practices against which we seek to legislate.

Mr. President, it is all right for Senators to abandon the Chamber; it is all right for them to retire to the cloakrooms and to smoke while the discussion goes on, and then to rush into the Chamber and demand an immediate vote; but I undertake to say that the day will come when every man who has treated this as a light question will have occasion in his own heart to regret the fact that he did not give it earnest consideration.

I am surprised to find this situation. Nearly every Senator wants to reach certain dishonest methods that have been employed by great corporations and monopolies to destroy their weaker antagonists. That being the common purpose, it would seem that all should be willing to pursue the highway of safety rather than the doubtful path of experimentation and guesswork. It seems to me that a sincere friend of this bill ought not to take the chance of its being stricken down as unconstitutional when it is perfectly plain that that chance need not be taken.

I have no quarrel with those men who have implicit confidence in their own judgment of constitutional questions. A man who does not have some confidence in his own opinion amounts to but little; but in view of the fact that this question must ultimately be determined by a human tribunal, in view of the fact that that tribunal may have upon it men who are not so wise as these constitutional lawyers who are so confident, it seems to me that the part of prudence would be to pay some regard to the opinions of others, lest some person equally foolish may peradventure be upon the commission or upon some court passing upon the acts of the commission.

We are presented with the situation that in this Chamber Senators who for years have sat upon the Federal bench with distinction and credit have declared section 5 of the bill as it is now written to be not only unconstitutional but dangerous. We see men who have been judges of State supreme courts entertaining like views; we see lawyers who have attained to distinction at the bar of their respective States expressing like opinions. It seems to me that fact, at least, suggests a danger. It seems to me that the real friends of this bill, one of whom I claim to be if the bill is properly safeguarded, ought to want to avoid that danger.

The old illustration comes to my mind at this moment of a great contest of charioteers. To display their skill they each in turn drove along the sheer edge of a precipice, each endeavoring to drive his chariot closer to the dangerous edge of the chasm. Finally one charioteer, to the astonishment of all, drove his master as far away from the edge of the precipice as he could carry him. When asked why, he declared that it was no part of the business or the duty of the driver of a chariot to carry his master into unnecessary danger; that it was his duty to avoid every unnecessary hazard and only to carry his master into peril when the interests of the state so demanded it. That driver was by the wise men of the day awarded the palm as the best charioteer in the contest.

When we are framing a law we ought to try to draw it so that it will stand the test of every assault. We ought also to try to frame it so that every citizen reading the law can tell what is prohibited and what is permitted.

Mr. President, the bill as it now stands contains no definition whatever of unfair competition. There is not a line in it, from its first word to its last letter, suggesting even by inference of the remotest degree what is meant by the term "unfair competition." The term stands out alone; it is isolated from everything in the bill. It is expressed in the eight words:

Unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

If, therefore, we are to ascertain its meaning we must go outside of the bill for that meaning.

I repeat what I said a few days ago, that this phrase is not to be compared with the sections of the Sherman Antitrust Act, for there, while the term "restraint of trade" was used, that term had a meaning in the law. The words "restraint of trade" and the word "monopoly" did not stand out alone, but the context that went with those words in each section plainly exposed the purpose of the authors of that bill and the legislative purpose in enacting it. But here we have a section declaring "unfair competition" to be unlawful, without a word in the bill to define that term or to throw light upon the legislative intent. Unless, therefore, the term is defined outside the bill there can be no meaning ascribed to it.

Now, Mr. President, I affirm, and I am about to undertake to demonstrate, that there has been much misrepresentation of the law upon this question. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] read here a learned document, which I shall undertake to demonstrate—not because I have any controversy with him or with Mr. Rublee, but because I have controversy with the ideas advanced—did not, in scarcely a single particular, set forth the law, fairly present the decisions, or fairly quote the statutes upon which he relied.

As I have stated, it would not be worth while to take the time of the Senate to thrash out any differences or disputes between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself, but his authorities went into the RECORD, and beyond doubt some Senators were led to believe they were as represented. The first thing I want to call your attention to is this statement, which is found in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire—I am going to read a little of it:

In his remarks on this subject on July 13 the distinguished Senator challenged any friend of the bill to produce an authority to show that the term "unfair competition" covers the abuses at which this bill is aimed.

Before I conclude I shall produce many such authorities—

I pause to say now that he produced not one such authority. I continue reading:

Before I conclude I shall produce many such authorities. But first I may be pardoned for the suggestion that the Senator was equally emphatic when he based his first argument on an overruled case, and his second argument on a proposition he has himself overruled.

That is a little byplay that I need not pause to discuss; but following on:

I have tried to find the latest edition of Black's Law Dictionary, which was quoted from copiously by the Senator in his speech. I have not been able to find it, but it is no doubt correctly quoted from. I do find, however, in Black's Law Dictionary, edition of 1891, page 238, the following:

"Competition: In Scotch practice. The contest among creditors claiming on their respective diligences, or creditors claiming on their securities."

The Senator continued:

Now, there is a definition of the word "competition," and, under the reasoning of the Senator, because unfair competition is defined in a dictionary or in cases as applying only to cases of palming off goods or substitution, then the same argument would apply here, and when the word "competition" is used it has this extremely limited meaning. But would anyone argue that this precise, limited meaning of the word "competition" would bind courts in construing a statute dealing with competition?

I have looked through Anderson's Law Dictionary, through Abbott's Law Dictionary, and Bouvier's Law Dictionary, and I find no such limited definition of "unfair competition."

I have carefully examined many of the cases cited by the Senator to establish the point that the term "unfair competition" is confined in law exclusively to the practice of substituting one kind of goods for another. None of these cases supports the Senator's proposition.

And a little later the Senator states, after citing numerous cases:

In addition there are numerous textbooks on unfair competition in which the authorities are collected and analyzed.

And then the Senator says:

Among such works are Singer on Trade-Mark Laws of the World, and Unfair Trade; Paul on the Law of Trade-Marks, Including Trade Names and Unfair Competition; Nims on the Law of Unfair Business Competition; Hopkins on the Law of Trade-Marks, Trade Names, and Unfair Competition; Hesseltine's Digest of the Law of Trade-Marks and Unfair Trade.

All this to support his statement that the definition of unfair competition he gave was to be found in the aforementioned books; all to support his charge, either direct or indirect, that I did not quote fairly from the authorities.

Mr. President, every authority cited by the Senator I shall undertake to show—I am referring now to the textbooks—is squarely against his position, squarely condemns his doctrine, and is an authority absolutely against the claim he made here upon the floor of the Senate.

First, I want to convince the Senator that the definition of unfair competition which I read from the second edition of Black's Law Dictionary is in the book, and I find that it reads exactly as it read when I previously produced it in the Senate. If the Senator could not find the 1910 edition of Black's Dictionary, it was because his industry was not equal to his zeal. Here it is:

Unfair competition: A term which may be applied generally to all dishonest or fraudulent rivalry in trade and commerce, but is particularly applied in the courts of equity (where it may be restrained by injunction) to the practice of endeavoring to substitute one's own goods or products in the markets for those of another, having an established reputation and extensive sale, by means of imitating or counterfeiting the name, title, size, shape, or distinctive peculiarities of the article—

And so forth.

And lest the Senator should doubt my statement that that definition is in Black's, I hand him the book.

Then the Senator, as showing that the term "unfair competition" had no such meaning, cited, without quoting, Singer on Trade-Marks. I hold in my hand Singer on Trade-Marks, and at page 630, under the title "Unfair competition," I find this——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; the Senator would not yield to me the other day, but I will yield to him.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator will never forget that. I began my remarks on that occasion by asking not to be interrupted, and it seems to have hurt the Senator's feelings.

In the address which I made on that day I gave the authorities so that all Members of the Senate could look at them. The authority the Senator is quoting from now I did not cite as supporting my side of the controversy more than his own. I had finished the particular authorities to which I referred, and I then referred to the general authorities on the subject, not stating that they supported my contention or his, but leaving them to be read by the Senators if they cared to do so.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I will read exactly what the Senator said. After a long argument, in which he asserted that the term "unfair competition" did not have the restricted meaning I asserted it to have, and as a part of his argument to that effect, he went on to say:

In order to get very complete and specific information about unfair competition one has only to turn to the decrees in cases under the Sherman Act.

Very complete and specific information as to what? That I was right? Why, the Senator was trying to batter my views down, trying to batter my definition down. Clearly he intended to be understood that these authorities sustained his point. Did you ever hear of a lawyer in a case citing authorities for the other side?

I continue to read:

There will be found precisely defined numerous examples of unfair competition. Nowhere is it more indispensable to use language having precise meaning than in a decree. Yet in the case of United States against General Electric Co., in the decree entered by the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division, at the end of the eighth clause, enjoining the use of a specific unfair method of competition, the following language is found:

"Provided further, That nothing in this decree shall be taken in any respect to enjoin or restrain fair, free, and open competition."

In addition—

Says the Senator—

there are numerous textbooks on unfair competition in which the authorities are collected and analyzed. Among such works are Singer on Trade-Mark Laws of the World, and Unfair Trade.

Then follows a long statement of authorities. Now, it is perfectly plain the Senator cited those authorities and led the Senate to believe that those authorities sustained his position. I now call attention to what the authorities do say.

I refer again to Singer on Trade-Marks, at page 630. I am reading from the 1913 edition, the very latest, probably, that there is:

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

No trader has a right to pass off his goods as though they were the goods of another trader

The majority of unfair-competition cases are instances of attempts by the defendant to pass off his goods as those of his rival. There are cases, however, of attempts of defendants to pass off not their goods as those of the rival but the rival's goods as their goods and goods of third persons as the goods of the plaintiff. These are just as much cases of unfair competition—passing-off cases—as the more common sort. (Nims on Unfair Competition, sec. 15.)

Unfair competition consists essentially in the conduct of a trade or business in such a manner that there is an express or implied representation that the goods or business of the one man are the goods or business of another.

Then a long chapter on the subject follows, which I shall not take time to read, describing various devices that have been condemned, because and only because the public has been deceived with reference to the real manufacturer of a particular article, and because the devices have been used to steal the trade of a dealer. Here is the latest that I have found in the textbooks, the 1913 edition, and it was cited by the distinguished Senator as showing that I had been wrong in saying that the courts had given "unfair competition" the restricted meaning I have just indicated.

The next book referred to by the Senator as sustaining the so-called broad definition of "unfair competition" was Paul on Trade-Marks. I read now from that author under the heading "Unfair competition in trade," paragraph 209, subhead "Basis of the rule—General principles":

The law of unfair competition rests upon the simple principle that no person has the right to sell his own goods as those of another. In other words, the basic rule is that no one shall, by imitation or any unfair device, induce the public to believe that the goods he offers for sale are the goods of another, and thereby appropriate to himself the value of the reputation which the other has acquired for his own products or merchandise.

It seems to me this declaration brings mighty cold comfort for those who say that these books are the ones they rely on to show that "unfair competition" does not embrace simply the particular practice of "substitution," but has a horizon so broad that it embraces everything that is unfair, everything that is rascally, everything that does not accord with the highest ethics or the purest morals.

The Senator quoted from Nims on Unfair Competition, paragraph 15. I am reading from Nims:

The majority of unfair-competition cases are instances of attempts by the defendant to pass off his goods as those of his rival. There are cases, however, of attempts of defendants to pass off, not their goods as those of the rival, but the rival's goods as their goods and goods of third persons as the goods of the plaintiff. These are just as much cases of unfair competition—passing-off cases—as the more common sort.

That is the very language that is quoted in the author I just read from.

Then, at paragraph 14, the definitions of "unfair competition" are given:

The following are various statements of the courts as to what unfair competition is. These citations do not cover the ground fully, for this doctrine of law, as has been said, is not stable; it is continually being applied to new wrongs, continually being invoked to right injuries that arise from new combinations of circumstances which work injury and fraud. The fundamental rule is—

Now, here is the fundamental rule—and you will find all of the practices referred to are condemned because they are grouped around this:

The fundamental rule is that one man has no right to palm off his own goods as the goods of a rival trader, and "he can not, therefore," in the language of Lord Langdale in Perry v. Truefitt, "be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia, by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person." Referring to the above, Lord Herschell, in Reddaway v. Banham, said: "It is, in my opinion, this fundamental rule which governs all cases."

"Irrespective of the technical question of trade-mark, the defendants have no right to dress their goods up in such manner as to deceive an intending purchaser"—

And so forth.

I do not find in this book any instance, although I have not read it through from cover to cover, where the unfair competition is not of a character and nature which is embraced within the prohibition against the substitution of one man's goods for the goods of another, yet this is one of the authorities cited by the learned Senator.

The Senator also cited the Law of Trade-Marks and Unfair Trade, by Hesseltine. I read from that book, the 1906 edition, which is the latest I have been able to find and which I think is the latest work by this author upon the subject:

Unfair trade—

Not unfair competition; and there is a great difference between the two terms.

Unfair trade—

Which is the nearest approach to the term "unfair competition" I find in this book—

A. A descriptive sign not in general use if used by a party with the intention of pirating on the good will of another who has acquired a reputation under it and of palming off on the public his goods as those of another may be protected on the ground of unfair trade.

The tendency of the courts at the present time seems to be to restrict the scope of the law applicable to technical trade-marks and to extend its scope in cases of unfair competition. (Church & Dwight Co. v. Russ, 99 Fed. R., 276.)

Then the author proceeds to discuss the "unfair trade," and in every instance the discussion relates to the subject matter I have been discussing, to wit, the substitution of one man's goods for the goods of another.

The Senator from New Hampshire cited Hopkins on Unfair Trade as one of his authorities, but did not quote from it. I was unable to bring the book here to make profert of it, but at page 24 this will be found. I quote:

In 1896 Lord Chancellor Halsbury, addressing the House of Lords, said: "For myself, I believe the principle of the law may be very plainly stated, and that is that nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else." This sentence is a terse statement of the fundamental maxim of unfair competition. The English courts have long recognized the rule, and it may be found repeated in various phraseology by all the English courts within whose jurisdiction trade-mark and analogous cases have come.

I quote further, from page 25:

Not until 1888 did the United States Supreme Court give distinct recognition to the law of unfair competition, and three years later Mr. Chief Justice Fuller announced the doctrine clearly and unequivocally in these terms: "It seems, however, to be contended that plaintiff was entitled at least to an injunction upon the principles applicable to cacses analogous to trade-marks; that is to say, on the ground of fraud on the public and on the plaintiff perpetrated by defendant by intentionally and fraudulently selling its goods as those of the plaintiff."

Mr. President, I come now to another very interesting phase of this discussion. For the first time in my life I have heard a lawyer in court or out of court say that you can get the meaning of a term employed in a Federal statute by going to the statutes of various States where that term is defined, unless the Federal statute had been copied from the State statute. Even in that event nothing would avail unless you carried into the Federal statute the definition contained in the State statute, for if you did not carry it in you could not claim you had copied a law and hence were entitled to carry with the law its meaning. You can not incorporate a statute by using one term out of a statute. But the argument—and it has seemed to me to be a laughable argument—has been that the term "unfair competition" having been employed, as it was asserted, by various State legislatures, therefore it has a meaning, and that that meaning will now be given to the term as we employ it here.

There are three or four answers to that. I will make the weakest one first. The weakest answer to it is that in every single one of these statutes the term employed is in the statute defined. Hence we gain no definition of the term unless we incorporate the definition in the statute, and we do not propose here to reincorporate that definition.

Second. I believe I may say without overstatement that there are no two of the statutes which define the term in the same way. Now, I appeal to the few logicians who still sit in the Senate. I do not appeal to the Senators in the cloakroom who clamor so loudly for attendance here, but who take their orders and do not see fit to pause and consider. If there are 10 statutes, all defining "unfair competition" in a different way, where will you get your rule as to the meaning of the term "unfair competition"?

If you have 10 different meanings, which one is to be accepted? Are you to add them all together and say "It means all of these things," or are you to pick the one that suits you best and say "This is what it means," or are you to add them together and divide them by the total number and get the average of what they all mean?

An argument of that kind ought to shock even the superb and indomitable courage of the legislative Ajax of this century, the distinguished chairman of the committee.

But, sir, I am here to say that the term "unfair competition" is not even defined in a single State statute that I have found. The astonishing thing is that the Senator from New Hampshire read all these statutes, or excerpts from them, and asserted them to be statutes defining unfair competition. Here is the way this document my friend read from appears in the RECORD. It was very carefully prepared for the RECORD:

California Statutes, 1913, page 508; act 4207a; title 526a:

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Then the Senator read this:

An act relating to unfair competition and discrimination, making certain unfair and discriminatory practices unlawful, defining the duties of the attorney general, etc.

The Senator reproduced the title of the act. But, Mr. President, what is the body of the act? Now I am challenging the attention of the distinguished chairman of this committee. I am also challenging the attention of the Senator who read the title of this act and did not read the body, and who read it as a definition of "unfair competition."

This is the body of the act:

1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation doing business in the State of California and engaged in the production, manufacture, distribution, or sale of any commodity of general use or consumption, or the product or service of any public utility, with the intent to destroy the competition of any regular established dealer in such commodity, product, or service, or to prevent the competition of any person, firm, private corporation, or municipal or other public corporation, who or which in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer—

To do what? To be guilty of unfair competition? No—

to discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities, or portions thereof, of this State, by selling or furnishing such commodity, product, or service at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof, than in another, after making allowance for difference, if any, in the grade, quality, or quantity, and for cost differences between such places due to distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution, and expense of distribution and operation. This act is not intended to prohibit the meeting in good faith of a competitive rate or to prevent a reasonable classification of service by public utilities for the purpose of establishing rates. The inhibition hereof against locality discrimination shall embrace any scheme of special rebates, collateral contracts, or any device of any nature whereby such discrimination is in substance or fact effected in violation of the spirit and intent of this act.

Mr. President, that is a statute against unjust discrimination, and the unjust discrimination is described in the statute. If you will write a definition one-tenth part as definite as that of unfair competition and put it into this statute, I shall cease complaining. But this statute of California gives a complete definition, not of unfair competition, but of discrimination. The two terms, I pause to remark at this point, are utterly different in their meaning, and the statute with reference to one throws not the least whit of light upon the other.

Competition—

Now note.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the dictionary?

Mr. REED. One I found on the desk—the Standard Dictionary.

Competition: The act or proceeding of striving for something that is sought by another at the same time; a contention of two or more for the same object or for superiority; rivalry, as between aspirants for honors or for advantage in business.

Competition embraces rivalry. Competition embraces a battle between two people, each of them striving for the same thing.

Let us see what "discrimination" means.

I read the fourth definition, which is the only one here employed, because it covers the only sense pertinent to this discussion:

The state or condition of being discriminated or distinguished; distinction; sometimes unjust distinction

The word "discriminate" carries a better definition. It is to preserve a difference, to draw a distinction. Here is perhaps the best definition of the term:

To make a distinction; deal unequally; as railroad companies sometimes discriminate between different shippers in rates.

Now, we have the two terms; one of them competition, which implies a rivalry between two individuals for the same thing, but discrimination is a term covering an entirely different thing. Discrimination covers the case of a man who refuses to trade with another or deal with another upon the same terms he is dealing with a third party. He discriminates against him or he discriminates in his favor. So any definition of the term "unfair discrimination" is utterly without value if you want to ascertain the meaning of the term "unfair competition," "competition" and "discrimination" being diametrically different. Indeed, the terms are almost opposites.

But now note, as we go along in search of a definition of unfair competition, that while the California statute covers a discrimination in the prices between different communities it also covers rebates and, in addition, certain discriminatory contracts.

I come now to the laws of Utah, which the Senator classified under the head of "unfair-competition statutes." I find that, in the book as it is printed, the man who compiled it entitled the chapter "Unfair competition and discrimination." I find that the title of the act is "An act to define and prohibit unfair competition and discrimination." When I come to read the act, I find that it reads:

Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Utah and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use that intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regular established dealer in such commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person who in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer, shall discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof, than such person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, charges for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed—shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination.

Shall be deemed what? Shall be deemed guilty of unfair competition? No—

How are you going to get a definition of unfair competition out of that statute, which deals with unfair discrimination and does not deal with unfair competition, which is chiefly aimed at monopolistic practices and does not concern itself with the case of two men going out, each trying to get the business of the public and each competing against the other? Yet it has been cited here to show that it did cover unfair competition—that that is what it means.

Note, now, that we have the California statute prohibiting certain practices and the Utah statute covering certain other practices. Thus you already have two different statutory rules. The California statute covers the question of underselling by everybody, including the product or service of any public utility. It also embraces rebates and special contracts, while the Utah statute does not embrace all of the things that the California statute covers. Thus you have two very different definitions or rules.

The Wyoming statute was cited as prohibiting unfair competition, and yet I find this is the way it reads:

That any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Wyoming and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall, intentionally, for the purpose of destroying competition—

It is a restraint of trade act; that is all—discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State, by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof, than is charged for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution, and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed—

Shall be deemed to be of unfair competition? Not at all—

shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination.

Again you have a statute different in its scope and meaning from either of the statutes I have just read. Assume for a moment that it is an "unfair-competition" statute; you will have three rules laid down instead of one, and you are three times worse off than you were before you looked at any statute.

The Louisiana statute is cited as defining "unfair competition." Here is the title:

An act to prohibit unfair commercial discrimination between different sections, communities, cities, or localities in the State of Louisiana or unfair competition therein, and providing penalties therefor.

When you come to read the text you find this language:

That any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Louisiana and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall, intentionally for the purpose of injuring or destroying the business of a competitor in any locality, discriminating between different sections, communities, cities, or localities in the State of Louisiana, by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, city, or locality, than is charged for such commodity by said person, firm, company, association, or corporation in another section, community, city, or locality, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality of such commodity and in the actual cost of transportation of same from the point of production, if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture, if a manufactured product, shall be guilty of unfair discrimination—which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful and to be a misdemeanor; and that all sales so made shall be taken and considered as prima facie evidence of unfair discrimination.

Not unfair competition—

The statute is aimed at the destructive tactics of monopoly. It reaches monopoly and restraint of trade.

I ask the author of this bill, or the sponsor for it—for I do not believe that the bill originated in the Senate; I think it was written largely by a gentleman outside the Senate—how he gets the definition of unfair competition out of a statute that defines not unfair competition but unfair discrimination? How does he get a definition out of the four statutes that I have read when each differs from the other?

However, they have a sort of common purpose thus far, and that is to prohibit local price cutting. If they are to operate as guides as to the meaning of unfair competition, then they restrict that meaning; they narrow that meaning; they limit that meaning, so that the bill can not possibly cover the things the Senator desires to have it cover.

Let me call attention to the New Jersey statute. It was cited. Of course, we must assume if a statute can be found that defines unfair competition broadly—if one could be found—our friends will claim that was a great authority and will instantly pin their faith to that particular statute, because it happens to suit their purpose. Unfortunately for these statutory constructionists, here comes New Jersey, the home of the President, the virgin spot from which now springs all the virtues. Here is located the fountain spring of reform. Here the Senator from Nevada ought to come morning and night and drink. He should bathe in its pure waters. To the recent statutes of New Jersey all should turn. I commend them to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who thought that this term probably had somewhere been defined. I have read you a Wyoming, a Utah, and a California definition, all of them generally aiming at discrimination in prices between communities or local price cutting, but when I come to New Jersey, the perennial source of light, I find that April 1, 1913, the general assembly of that State passed an act to prevent "unfair competition and unfair trade practices." Notice the language comes nearer to the term we are discussing than you can find in any other statute. It very nearly is the employment of your term. What is the statute?

1. It shall be unlawful for any merchant, firm, or corporation, for the purpose of attracting trade for other goods, to appropriate for his or their own ends a name, brand, trade-mark, reputation, or good will of any maker in whose product said merchant, firm or corporation deals, or to discriminate against the same, by depreciating the value of such products in the public mind, or by misrepresentation as to value or quality, or by price inducement, or by unfair discrimination between buyers, or in any other manner whatsoever, except in cases where said goods do not carry any notice prohibiting such practice, and excepting in case of a receiver's sale, or a sale by a concern going out of business.

2. Any person, firm, or corporation violating this act shall be liable at the suit of the maker of such branded or trade-marked goods, or any other injured person, to an injunction against such practices, and shall be liable in such suit for all damages directly or indirectly caused to the maker by such practices, which said damages may be increased threefold, in the discretion of the court.

Why, that statute gives practically the old common-law definition of "unfair competition." The legislature only reenacted the common law and added a clause including trade slanders.

I pause at this time to call attention to the fact that by seeking in the statutes for the meaning of the term we have already five different definitions, and that the statute that comes nearest using the terms in this bill takes us back to nearly the old common-law definition. But nowhere do we find the nebulous definition that covers everything and touches nothing which it is proposed shall be the guide for the courts when they come to decide what is meant by unfair competition.

Nebraska. I am not going to take time to read the Nebraska act. It relates to local price cutting and it does not prohibit unfair competition. You can find the term in the title, but you can not find the term in the act.

The title is "An act to prohibit unfair commercial discrimination between different sections, communities, or localities, or unfair competition, and providing penalties therefor." When you come to the body of the act, and I shall print it with the permission of the Senate as a part of my remarks, after prohibiting local price cutting, the statute reads "shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination," not "unfair competition."

The matter referred to by Senator REED is as follows:

An act entitled "An act to prohibit unfair commercial discrimination between different sections, communities, or localities, or unfair competition, and providing penalties therefor."

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Nebraska: SECTION 1. (Local unfair discriminations.) Any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Nebraska and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor in any locality, discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city than is charged for said commodity by said party in another section, community, or city, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality and in the actual cost of transportation from the point of production, if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture, if a manufactured product, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful.

Mr. REED. Now, you have six or seven different definitions of unfair competition by as many statutes. I am for the present treating the terms "unfair discrimination" and "unfair competition" as synonymous, which they are not. They can not be used interchangeably, for the reasons I gave when I read the definitions from the dictionary.

Here is another definition in the Minnesota law. We were told by the Senator from New Hampshire that in Minnesota's laws there was a definition of unfair competition, and that because it had been employed in the Minnesota statute it had acquired a new meaning. What is the Minnesota statute?

Any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Minnesota and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of petroleum or any of its products that shall intentionally or otherwise, for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor or creating a monopoly in any locality, discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State, by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city than is charged for such commodity by said party in another section, community, or city, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the test or quality and in the actual cost of transportation from the point of production if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture if a manufactured product, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

If you have unfair competition in the title, you have nothing but unfair discrimination in the act; and if you had unfair competition in the act itself, you are in this unfortunate condition that it would define unfair competition as simply being local price cutting by the Standard Oil on kerosene. The statute probably does not even cover gasoline. The definition of unfair competition is by this statute confined to Standard Oil. I say you have a definition of unfair competition; I should say, "unfair discrimination." The law is simply leveled at one practice of one concern.

Now, you have seven different statutory rules, not of unfair competition, but unfair discrimination, and out of that you are to get the meaning of the term "unfair competition." Out of that the people of this country are to get the meaning.

But, Mr. President, as we proceed to the construction of a term in a Federal statute by the light of the various State statutes, each of which has defined some act, and each of which has characterized it in almost every instance as unfair discrimination, we find that when we examine another Minnesota statute we jump suddenly from the nebula into the milky way. Observe the terms of the Minnesota law—

Any person, firm, copartnership, or corporation engaged in the business of buying milk, cream, or butter fat for the purpose of manufacture—

Not for the purpose of feeding it to babes or for general consumption. You notice that it is limited to the man who buys it for the purpose of manufacture—who shall, with the intention of creating a monopoly or destroying the business of a competitor, discriminate between different sections, localities, etc., shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination—and be fined, and so forth.

We have gotten away from the general doctrine of unfair discrimination by local price cutting as to all things, and we have now arrived at a definition where it is confined to milk and cream or butter fat.

Oh, how a lawyer will look when he comes before a court asserting that he can show that this term has a real meaning by reading the definition of the different statutes. He finds that there is not a statute defining the term "unfair competition" and then finds that when the statutes can define "unfair discrimination" they cover everything in the wide range between a statute of universal application and a statute that is limited to the buying of milk. He finds that some of them apply to all things, some of them to a few things, some of them apply only to petroleum, and some of them limit their remedial provisions to cream and butter fat.

Let us now go to Iowa. I have not the Iowa statutes here, so I can not give the Senator from New Hampshire the title, but I can give him the body of the act literally:

Any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Iowa and engaged in the business of buying milk, cream, or butter fat for the purpose of manufacture—

Ah, but the Iowa man reached out for something else now; you still have another rule—or of buying poultry, eggs, or grain for the purpose of sale or storage, that shall, for the purpose of creating a monopoly or destroying the business of a competitor, discriminate, etc., shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination—

And if found guilty of unfair discrimination he shall be punished, and so forth.

Why, you could not even get a rule out of the two statutes last quoted covering a milk case, because they differ even as to milk. If a man came before this board charged with unfair competition in eggs, you would have to try him under the Iowa statute. You would be compelled to disregard the Minnesota statute, because it forgot all about the hens. I believe Iowa is the only State that has cast the protecting ægis of its statute over the common barnyard hen.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Of course, if you were trying a milk case you might try it either under the Iowa statute or you might try it under the Minnesota statute, but the hen can find a venue for her wrongs only in Iowa. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I simply wanted to suggest that it was a very good provision to protect the Iowa hen, because the products of the Iowa hen amount per year to more than the entire gold output of Alaska.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is no product from the State of Iowa, including its Senators, that is not worthy of all protection and all honor. Incidentally, I remark that I have no doubt but that at least one of them just at this particular moment would be glad to have a statute passed preventing unfair competition at the polls. I think there would be a great deal more sense in employing the term in that way, and we could come nearer telling what it means than as it is employed in this proposed statute.

All these statutes were cited by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] as furnishing a guide and rule by which we could determine just what the term "unfair competition" means, whereas, as you will observe, its meaning, by statute, is purely a question of geography. If you go to Minnesota and buy up butter and do not pay a proper price, you are guilty of unfair discrimination; but you can buy all the eggs that you want to and not be guilty of any crime. If, however, you wander over into the State of Iowa, the moment you cross the line and there buy eggs under certain conditions you are guilty of unfair discrimination. If you are cornering the petroleum market, and you are in the State of Minnesota, you are a criminal; elsewhere you are a captain of finance. In the State of Minnesota and nowhere else have they passed a statute bearing directly upon our friend, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. President, I have gone through these statutes—perhaps there are one or two more, but if they are read they will be found to be of like kind with those I have read—and I have no difficulty in enforcing, I think, the opinion upon every candid man who is here that if, in searching for the meaning of the term "unfair competition," we are to go to the statutes of these various States we would find that the further we travel the more we will be involved in a labyrinth of doubt. The more statutes we find and the less rule we have; aye, we have as many rules as we have statutes.

Besides all these difficulties, unfortunately for the advocates of statutory definitions, the statutes do not define "unfair competition" at all; on the contrary, when you come to read them, they define "unfair discrimination" and "unfair trade practices."

Imagine a lawyer called upon to advise a client as to whether a certain thing he intended to do could be done without violating the law; imagine this lawyer seeking for the meaning of the term "unfair competition"; imagine him getting down the law dictionaries and finding there that the law is defined in the restricted sense I have shown, so that it applies merely to the substitution of goods. He goes then to the laws of New Jersey, and he finds that New Jersey in 1913 by statute gave practically the same definition. He proceeds to the statutes of other States, and now he finds that a thing is legal in one State and is illegal in another; that a thing is denounced in one State and not denounced in another. He reads through all statutes and finds that the term "unfair competition" is nowhere defined, but that "unfair discrimination" is defined. After he has done all that he undertakes, in the light thus shed upon his intellect, to advise his client as to the meaning of the term "unfair competition." If he be a lawyer worthy of the name, I think he will say, "The definition of 'unfair competition' in the law dictionary is the one we can most safely follow. If we can not follow that, then all we can do is to say to this commission, 'Lead, kindly light'; you make the rules; you tell us what to do; that which you say is right we will obey."

That, Mr. President, is not obedience to law. That is obedience to masters. That is not government by law. That is government by the dictation of men. That is the substitution of arbitrary power for legal enactment. That is a power greater, I believe, than even the Kaiser of all the Germans possesses.

Mr. STONE. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I am not myself free from the doubt that troubles my colleague with respect to the term used, but I am not at all convinced that he is not too positive. I am inclined to think he is.

The Senator says that if a lawyer should go before a court in a case and undertake to define the term "unfair competition" he could not do so by referring to this statute or to that statute or to this authority or to that authority, for the reason that there is no perfect definition, and perhaps no definition at all within the view of the Senator; but the thing I have in mind is this, and it is to that that I wish to direct the attention of my colleague: Would it be necessary to define the term "unfair competition" if I were trying a case before the court?

Let me give an illustration that occurs to me of a merchant or a manufacturer at a given point in a State undertaking to run his competitors out of business. He puts on the market an article which he advertises to be and claims to be the equal in every way of that of his competitor, or, to state it still more strongly, to be the exact article sold by his competitor, when, as a matter of fact, it is an inferior article. Suppose he sells that inferior article in the same marts at a price not above the actual cost to him, or even below it, his object being to crush opposition; he may be possessed of vastly greater wealth and resources than his competitors, and may suffer a temporary loss in the way I have described, with a view of eliminating competition; would not that be a clear case of unfair competition, of representing, in the first place, that he is selling exactly the same article as are his competitors when he was not, but was selling an inferior article, and when he was selling the inferior article at below cost, with the apparent purpose of destroying his competitors? I ask again, would not that be a clear case of unfair competition?

If I were prosecuting that case, civilly or criminally, before the court on the ground and allegation that it was unfair competition, would the court ask me to define "unfair competition"? Would it not be sufficient for me to state that the facts of the case define the practice to be unfair competition?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has exactly stated a case of unfair competition, as defined by all the books, and if the term is employed to cover the particular practice he names it would be a case of unfair competition, because the very definitions I have read here from the law dictionaries cover to a nicety the illustration the Senator has put; that is to say, A being in business, B comes along and falsely says to the public, "I have exactly the same thing that A is selling you." He deceives the public, and thus he steals the trade and good will of A. Now, if we were to adopt this section with the term "unfair competition" in it, and the courts were to say, as I think they are likely to say, that the term "unfair competition" embraces that particular practice, and no more, then you could go into court and prosecute your man, but you would have to set up in the indictment that he was guilty of unfair competition in this, to wit, and then set out the facts.

In the case suggested I would be obliged to answer yes, because the Senator stated a case squarely within my definition. That is a case within the definition which I insist the books lay down. It is a case of actual unfair competition as defined by the law.

Mr. STONE. Let me state the case a little differently. Suppose he did not represent that the article he was selling was the exact article and was made or manufactured by the same people, but that it was in its general nature the same?

Mr. REED. That it was as good an article?

Mr. STONE. That it was as good in every way and would serve the same purposes, when, as a matter of fact, it was not of the same general character, but was a deception in itself, and then he undertook by unfair means, such as I have indicated, to run his competitor out of business, would not the facts of the case itself constitute a definition of "unfair competition"? The cases can be multiplied; of course they are not single or exceptional.

Mr. REED. I would have been glad to have answered the Senator's first illustration, because it would have been a very apt illustration. The Senator, however, qualified it by adding that if the competitor "should represent his goods to be substantially the goods of the other, or like the goods of the other." You get too near with that qualification to the definition of "unfair competition" as laid down in the book. But let us take the case as the Senator first stated it the last time he was on his feet, that A is engaged in selling goods—for instance, sugar—in a community, and B enters the market and says to the public, "Why, I have sugar just as good as A's, and I am selling it for half a cent a pound cheaper." Now, B is brought before the commission. The question will arise at once, Has he been guilty of an unfair practice? I say that the first thing the board would be obliged to do would be to determine what is the meaning of the words "unfair practice." They would have to determine that by going to some books, to some authors, to some authorities, and they would naturally go first to the legal definition; and when they did go to the legal definition they would find that unfair competition consisted in the substitution by B of his goods for A's, a deception thereby being worked upon the public. Therefore I would demur, if I represented B, to the charge, upon the ground that he had not represented his goods to be the goods of A, but he had simply gone into the market saying that he had as good goods, puffing his own goods, as every trader has a right to do, and that he could be held under no law.

I am very sure that is just what the courts will say with reference to this statute when we get through with it, and if they do, we will have accomplished nothing, because that can now be prevented both at law and in equity.

I know no man is more sincere upon this question than my distinguished colleague, and a mere indication of a difference of judgment upon his part always makes me pause to ask myself whether I am not mistaken, no matter how firmly my view has been fixed. But I will now take the illustration I have just given: A is in the market selling sugar at 5 cents a pound; B comes into the market with a different kind of sugar, and asserts that it is as good as A's sugar, and he is selling it for half a cent a pound less. Is anybody here prepared to say that is a practice that ought to be stopped? Are you willing to grant the power to this board to say that he can not thus offer his sugar? Why, sir, that would kill competition; that would end the life of trade; that would be death to enterprise; that would deprive the public of the very protection all these laws are framed to give and insure to the public—a chance in the open market to buy goods where there are two or twenty or a hundred men offering the goods for sale. We must not do that; we must not put it in the power of any commission to do that. Let us see where we would come out.

I am appealing to those Senators who pay me the compliment of listening to consider lest we now make great mistakes. Let us assume that this board has the wide power, and that it should say to B, "You can not come into the market and say to the public your goods are as good as A's and thus get his trade away from him; you can not make that statement." What follows? Competition ceases. If you put it in the power of the board to stop that kind of competition, that kind of trade rivalry, you would put it in the power of the board to build up monopolistic profits and to make monopoly dominant in this country. Let me show you how.

Here is the Steel Trust, a powerful concern engaged in the manufacture of structural steel. It is putting it upon the market. Here comes an independent concern also making structural steel. Are you willing to put into the hands of a board the power to say to the independent concern, "You can not go on the market and represent that your goods are better than those of the Steel Trust"? When you do that, you make the Steel Trust all powerful and dominant, and you strike down any possible competition. Is any man in this Chamber willing to give that kind of power to a commission?

Now, unless you define the character of the act which you propose to allow the commission to stop, you will be just exactly where the illustration of my distinguished colleague brings us—you will be at a point where the board can stop competition, throttle competition, whether it makes for monopoly or does not make for monopoly; but if you adopt the definition that I have offered here, you will escape that, because we define it. It embraces—

All those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices done or used—with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

And here is the qualifying term—

Apply that rule to the very simple illustration we have been using of the sugar merchants. A has been selling sugar; B comes into the market and offers his sugar at a less price, and says to all the world in all his advertisements which he puts in every window and upon every fence post, "My sugar is the best sugar in this market, and is half a cent a pound cheaper than any other." He is now brought before this board. He answers, "This is competition," and he says, "You can not make a case against me unless you can show that in addition to advertising my goods and offering them to the public I have done it with the intent to unreasonably hinder the business of my competitor." When you come to the term "unreasonably hinder" you find that the Supreme Court of the United States has blazed the trail. It has said that competition where one man simply offers his goods in the market against those of another is reasonable competition. It has pointed out clearly what constitutes restraint of trade.

Mr. President, with that definition in the bill you have some guide for the business man and client; you have some guide for the court; you have some guide for the commissioner. In the absence of a definition all these will be asking the question my distinguished colleague asked. If, with his incisive mind and his broad learning and his vast experience, he asked the question, then certainly the grocery keeper, the little merchant, the big merchant, the country lawyer, and the city lawyer with one accord will despairingly exclaim, "What in the name of goodness does come within the term 'unfair competition'?"

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if, as a rule, the terms he uses in his amendment have been defined?

Mr. REED. Practically every one of them.

Mr. STONE. Let me put this question—of course I am asking to get the Senator's views and enlighten my own mind with respect to the subject before us.

Suppose an information should be filed before this commission charging that the party accused was guilty of unfair competition, and proceeding to state the facts constituting the unfair competition. Suppose it should appear from the facts and from the charge that there was a threat in it, that there was slander of business, or any of the terms used there by the Senator; suppose upon the hearing the commission, or afterwards the court, should be convinced that some one or more of the very terms employed were applicable to the case; that the facts showed, in other words, that just those things had been done. Now, would it not answer every purpose, and would not the court or the commission rule upon it from that standpoint, under the broad and unrestricted or undefined term "unfair competition"?

Mr. REED. Why, no, Mr. President; for the simple reason that unless you put that definition of unfair competition into the law it does not embrace these practices. Such, at least, is my contention. I maintain that the term is of limited legal meaning and that if you abandon the legal meaning then it is a term so vague, indefinite, and uncertain that nobody can tell what it means. Of course if in the statute itself you define the term "unfair competition" you escape the difficulties.

We can gain some light by considering the conduct of others. A great many lawyers, presumably good lawyers, have written these various statutes relating to "unfair discrimination" in the different States. Not one of them wrote a statute saying "unfair discrimination is hereby prohibited" and then stopped. If it would not be disrespectful, I would say that if one of them had, he would have been a fit subject for a lunatic asylum; but I can not say that with this bill before us. The lawyers who drew these State statutes proceeded in every instance to define the things that would constitute the unfair discrimination, although "discrimination" has in the law a much more well-defined meaning than the term "competition."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have listened with much interest and a good deal of sympathy to the argument made by the Senator from Missouri, and I want to ask him whether I am correct in drawing this deduction: That "unfair competition," in his opinion, should include every act which tends to destroy competition?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That it should include every act which is contrary to good business morals?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, then, I want to ask the Senator whether it would not be possible, in place of the definition which he has offered, simply to confine the definition of those two tendencies in language something like this:

The term "unfair competition" as used in this act shall be held to include all devices and acts the chief effect of which is to destroy competition and the nature of which is contrary to business morals.

Mr. REED. That definition would be infinitely better than nothing. That would give us something, but I do not think it applies an accurate rule or proper test—perhaps not at all the real test, and which I think I have embraced in my amendment.

If the Senator will give me the language that he used, so that I may comment on it, I shall be much obliged, because I am glad to hear anybody's suggestions.

The Senator's definition is:

The term "unfair competition" as used in this act shall be held to include all devices and acts the chief effect of which is to destroy competition and the nature of which is contrary to business morals.

There we introduce a doubtful question: "What are business morals?" Why, the business morals of Wall Street are one thing; the business morals of Omaha are another thing; and when you get down in the pure atmosphere and sweet sunlight of Missouri you find that business morals are a very much higher and more ethical thing than they are, at least, on Wall Street. I will not exclude Omaha. What we ought to do—and I am appealing to the Senator from Nebraska, because no man respects his judgment more than I respect it—is to stick to the terms that have been already elucidated by our courts.

What are we trying to do? Let us be fair. We are not trying to write a code of business morals. If we are, we are engaged in the most hopeless task men ever undertook. Our efforts will come to naught. We are trying to keep the doors of competition open in this land. We are trying to keep the highways of opportunity unobstructed. We are trying to keep it so that the feet of the men of to-day may travel along an open path, so that all may have a fair chance to gain a livelihood and to embark in business.

Now, we have found that there have been certain powerful institutions organized. Some of them have arrived at the point of almost absolute monopoly over some prime necessity of life. Some of them have grown so powerful that while they are not complete monopolies they can restrain trade, they can circumscribe the opportunities of others; and whenever one of these institutions has arrived at the point where it is a monopoly the Sherman antitrust law reaches it. Whenever it shall have arrived at a point where you can show that it is clearly restraining trade the Sherman Antitrust Act reaches it. You need not add a line to our statutes in order to suppress monopoly, and in order to suppress the actual restraint of trade, especially where the case is aggravated.

But, Mr. President, there are certain acts, practices, and devices which have been employed by these great concerns which have in the past been regarded as merely legitimate competition, as merely the ordinary methods of competition, but which, when put into practice, inevitably tend toward the destruction of competition, and thus toward the restraint of trade. Now, if we can reach those practices by this act we will have accomplished a great boon for our country.

Let me illustrate: There is no particular harm done if there are 2 rival merchants in a town, or 10 rival merchants, and they advertise their goods, each against the other, and if they occasionally hire each other's clerks. That does not restrain trade. There are so many clerks, there are so many institutions, that as a matter of fact trade is not seriously obstructed; no one is much hurt. Let us assume a case, however, like that of the Harvester Trust—and I speak of that only because its practices well illustrate the practices of other trusts.

It is complained in the Government's petition that one of the means it took for the purpose of destroying its competitors was to send agents into a trade territory and get all the trade away from the agents of their rivals, having in view the employment the next year of the agents of the rivals, thus depriving them at once of their trade and of the instrumentalities of their trade. Now, in a case of that kind, if the evidence showed the destructive purpose, or if the purpose was reasonably inferable from the evidence, a court could and would, under this provision as I have defined it, say, "You can not resort to that practice."

Another practice calculated not to benefit the purchaser, but to destroy competition, is well illustrated in certain practices attributed to the Standard Oil Co. It has been charged that that company goes into a trade territory which is occupied by a rival, drops the price of its products below their actual cost, and thus crushes and destroys the competitor, meantime selling in other communities at a higher price and gaining profits there, and out of those profits gained in other places sustaining itself, while it is selling goods at a loss in the community where their rival is located. When he is crushed it puts up the price. Now, that could be condemned under the provision I have drawn, because it tends to the restraint of business; it kills competition; it limits competition; it destroys competition; and therefore it would be reached under this provision.

Again, I will take the case of the slander of the business of another. In some of the trust cases—I have forgotten which ones; some of my distinguished legal brethren here will remember the cases when I refer to them—it was found that for the purpose of destroying rivals in business some of the great institutions had gone into a community and claimed that they had the sole right to the sale of a certain article and that anybody who purchased that article from others would be sued and harrassed by litigation and mulcted in damages, whereas, in truth and in fact, they had no substantial right upon which to base that claim.

It was merely a method used to destroy a competitor; not an attempt to sell goods, but to destroy a rival. That would be within the terms of my amendment, because it is an act done for the purpose of restraining trade. It is not the lessening of the trade of one man which results from simple competition. The object and purpose is to destroy the trade rival. That can be reached under this definition.

The language, too, which I have adopted, which I really think is too broad, but I have put it here out of consideration to the views of those who want to confer very large powers upon this board—the language "and all other acts or devices done or used with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business or to prevent another from engaging in business or restrain trade or to create a monopoly"—is language of the very broadest kind, and yet a business man will have no great difficulty in determining whether what he is about to do is merely a destructive practice calculated to restrain trade by crushing a rival. He need have no difficulty in distinguishing between such a practice and honestly selling his goods in the market against those of another man. You have a rule. There are milestones along the way. People can judge what they may do. But if you were to simply use the term "unfair competition" without any definition, and if it shall be given the broad meaning contended for, then I insist we have no rule and no guide except the judgment and opinion of the five men who constitute the board.

If those five men shall be gifted with infallibility of judgment, if they shall be men whose souls are inspired by the highest character of ethics, they would do no harm. But even then has not the business man in your community the right to have a law that he can reasonably understand? Is he obliged to submit all his transactions to the will even of an infallible board? Are you willing to substitute government by commission for government by law, government by the will of men for government by a law of the land enacted by the people? Is anyone here willing to do that? We may allow our enthusiasm for new doctrines to carry us so far that we shall find the old ship Constitution wrecked upon reefs we ourselves create.

I appeal to Senators, what reason have you to believe that this board may not be composed of ordinary human beings with ordinary frailty of judgment? What reason have you to believe and know they may not at some time be composed of the tools and proprietors of monopolies and combines and trusts? There are many men in this country of pure public and private life who believe that great combinations are necessary to the welfare of the people. There are many who believe that combinations are in the nature of blessings. There are many trust magnates who believe that the practices they have employed are justifiable. Many of them go to churches and make long prayers, perhaps not for pretense. Some of them stand upon the street corners and "make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments and thank God they are not as other men." Many a Pharisee has been a good-faith Pharisee.

Suppose you get a board of that kind. I do not want to arouse party animosity, but suppose our friend Roosevelt had appointed such a board. I think he would have put at the head of it George W. Perkins, a man of great intellect, a man who undoubtedly is a perfectly polished gentleman, but a man who probably believed when he organized the Harvester Trust and when he engaged in organizing other trusts that he was doing a service to humanity and to God.

Suppose you get a board of that kind, and suppose it decides every case in favor of the great combinations, what protection will you then have in this bill? There is no appeal to the courts from this tribunal by the party who makes the complaint. You have fixed the bill now by the Cummins amendment so that the complaining party or, indeed, any party has no substantial right of appeal.

You can not go into court and standing upon a substantive law say, "although this board, owned and controlled by the corporations, mastered and manned from their cohorts, has decided against all that is fair and all that is right, notwithstanding it has undertaken to sanction a practice which destroys my business, and therefore I now appeal to the court," because you have no substantive law to stand on. You have nothing to appeal from except the discretion of a commission exercised under the authority of a law which puts everything within its discretion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator this question: Is it not his conviction that where there is unfair competition between corporations, which unfair competition may result in the great benefit to the public, nevertheless this competition could be checked under the provisions of the law without any further definition?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator let me give one illustration of that? Here are two manufacturers selling their articles in competition with each other in a certain territory. One of the manufacturers advertises that his goods are produced by the most modern methods, that they are in every respect as good or better than those of his competitor, and that he will sell them 25 per cent cheaper than his competitor. We will assume that that public statement is false and untrue, that it is absolutely unfair, but the result has been that the competitor in that field has reduced the price of his product to meet the competition, and the public are getting his goods 25 per cent cheaper than they did before. Under that condition can not the man or corporation who has been compelled to reduce the price of his product by reason of that competition go before this commission and insist that his competitor's goods are not as good as his and that the competition is unfair, and ask an injunction against the continuance of that claim for the goods of the competitor?

Mr. REED. Certainly. That could be done if the bill is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by the chairman of the committee. This board is a board of practically unlimited power.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but further than that, Mr. President, as the bill now stands, after the defeat of the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, any person feeling himself aggrieved may go into court and ask for damages without going before the board at all, on the ground that his competitor has been guilty of unjust competition. It seems to me that for that reason, if for no other reason, we ought to have something in the bill that would define competition to mean something which is ultimately going to destroy a competitor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has stated a very strong case, a case in which bad morals were involved, in which falsehood was involved, and yet the effect was to promote competition, and hence promote the general welfare. Where will the business world be if we stop with this term without any definition?

Here are two rival dry goods houses. Pick up any paper and read their advertisements: "Unprecedentedly low prices; we are offering the public on next Tuesday goods cheaper than any of our competitors; cheaper than they were ever offered in this market." Would you give your trade commission power to stop mere trade competitions? Why can not the gentleman across the way come before the commission under this bill and say, "Now, that man is getting trade that might come to me; he is getting it by an advertisement, and I challenge the correctness of that advertisement"? Why can he not then hale his rival before the commission and ask it to cancel his advertisements? Into what kind of a chaotic condition will business be put? It will be put into a strait-jacket, and that strait-jacket will not be the same one day and the next, but it will simply depend for its shape and for the torture it may produce upon the opinions of these gentlemen from day to day.

You can not escape the proposition that you are granting arbitrary power. Does it not seem to Senators that we ought to say what we mean here, that we ought to lay down some general rule, when there is not a single man advocating this bill who will define "unfair competition" in the way any other man on the same side of the question defines it? Are we willing to confer upon a board of men a power which we so little understand that as the Senator from Ohio puts it the term is one of very limited and restricted meaning; as the Senator from Nevada puts it the term is so broad and universal that it will cover everything which is unfair?

The truth is there are a lot of people in this world who, seeing wrongs and hating them, seeing evils and wishing their eradication, seeing wickedness and believing that it ought not to exist, are willing to adopt any sort of specific that is brought forward. The more ignorant a man is the less he knows about the Constitution, the less he knows about the history of his country, the less he knows about the principles of law, the less he thinks of the Constitution, the less he thinks of the principles of law, the more ready he is to provide a universal specific. We have them writing for magazines. We have them writing speeches. We have them seeking to advise the Senate on every hand. They are men of the best intentions, yet men who may not have enough good judgment to run a truck farm and to market their own goods; yet we find an inclination to follow them, to quote them, and to read from them.

Mr. President, the Senator who is the author of this bill challenged me to write a definition. I have written one.

Nobody has yet seen fit to point out what evil practice it does not cover, and yet it lays down a rule the soul of which is found in the fact that the act complained of shall be an act the tendency of which is to restrain trade or create monopoly. That old path has been blazed by the courts and we know we can follow it. If you adopt this proposition I believe this law will be effective. You are conferring a greater power than I would confer upon a board even then, but I am willing to yield to the judgment of my associates and to try the experiment of giving a board a very broad power, but if you do not adopt some rule, and if the legal definition is not to be followed, then you have conferred upon the board the right to act within its discretion.

Now, what is the field of its discretion? There was a very able argument made here by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] a few days ago in which he dwelt upon the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission, proceeding under the term "unreasonable rate," had found a means of answering the great transportation questions in that term.

But what was the scope of the Interstate Commerce Commission's authority? It was to fix a reasonable rate. It did not have authority to wander at large in all the realms of business; it was to fix a reasonable rate. When it undertook to answer that question it did not proceed in a realm of speculation. It did not enter a country that had never been explored. On the contrary, it entered upon duties which had been clearly defined, and it proceeded in accordance with principles that were hundreds of years old. There was nothing new in it all.

Let us see. From the very first the highways have been under the control of government. They were built primarily by the government. There came a time in the history of the world when private corporations were permitted to build toll roads and to exact tolls, and away back there in the twilight of that development it was clearly written down that the proprietor of the toll road was, in effect, a mere agent of the public; that he had the right to collect certain tolls, so that he might have a fair return from his investment, but that beyond that the government was practically as supreme over the toll road as it was over any other highway.

So the question of what was a reasonable charge was then fixed; the rule was then determined.

When we built railroads in this country they were but an extension of the old practice. Every one of them is a public highway; it can not exist, it could not be built, except the power of eminent domain is exercised in its behalf. It is a public highway and a common carrier both at once. The question, "What is a reasonable charge?" was not difficult to determine. The old rule that had been applied to the turnpike, the old rule that had been applied to certain other public utilities, was lying there before the court. That rule was that the return should be sufficient to pay a fair interest upon the investment and the upkeep of the enterprise and return the original capital within a reasonable time, the latter being a qualification that did not universally apply, but did sometimes apply, according to the particular grant of authority which had been extended.

So when the Interstate Commerce Commission came to construe the term "reasonable rate" they did not wander in the wilderness of doubt and uncertainty; they were not in nebulæ; they had their feet upon the earth; they had the law books for a guide and the definitions before them. Following that rule, they had nothing to do except ascertain the investment, the fixed charges, the upkeep; and, having determined that, to figure what rates should be charged in order to pay a fair return. That was a limited field of activity. Its boundaries had been blazed for centuries by the axe of learning held in the hands of great judges.

But when you come to this board, what are its powers? It is not limited to the question of fixing a fair profit; it is not limited to the question of fixing rates upon railroads; it reaches into every line of human activity, provided it has any relation to interstate commerce. Before we are through with it, it will touch the small grocery keeper in your home town, for he is engaged in interstate commerce when he buys goods across the State line; it will touch the farmer upon his ranch who is engaged in raising steers in the State of Texas and shipping them into Oklahoma or to Kansas City or to Chicago; it will reach the cotton planter who raises his crop and who has the temerity to sell it in the markets of another State; it will reach the grower of wheat if he does not sell to a local dealer, but sees fit to put his wheat into cars and ship it to market in another State; it will reach the man——

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WHITE. If that will be the result, is it not a fact that the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution covers all kinds of commerce?

Mr. REED. Exactly; if we enact this statute we will have given to the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution a statutory construction which, if it stands, will almost wipe out State lines and take away two-thirds of the present authority of the States.

Mr. WHITE. Does the Senator believe that any such construction would be given?

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator—I know the Senator does not mean to question that what I am saying I am saying in good faith——

Mr. WHITE. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. I say to the Senator that I have seriously questioned in my mind the power of Congress to give the jurisdiction over an institution that happens to be engaged in interstate commerce which this bill conveys, but the consensus of opinion here has been—and it has been resistless—that we are to proceed with this legislation; and I say that, as I construe it, it embraces everything I have mentioned, and, in my opinion, it will be found to embrace everything, unless, indeed, some court says we have trenched upon a very fundamental of the Constitution and therefore halt us at the threshold of our adventure.

But what then can happen to these men? They may be dragged from the most distant parts of this country before this board; they can be called here from Montana and Arizona and the distant States of the golden coast, from every part of this country, to answer before this commission. When they have come before the commission, they are denied practically the right of appeal to a court.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] offered an amendment giving an appeal, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], persisting, as he had a right to do, in his battle for the supremacy of a commission, succeeded in having his amendment adopted. There is no appeal left to the court except you make your record here before the commission, and then, having made it, you go into court with all of the presumptions against you. You can not, then, prevail unless you can plant your feet upon some clause of the Constitution which shows you have been deprived of your rights. You must show that the commission has so violated its discretion as to have trampled on the Constitution

Ah, this is a dangerous power you are granting. Those who propose this bill know it is dangerous, else why have they provided that the decisions of this tribunal can not be laid down in a court as prima facie evidence of a fact found by them in cases where third parties are concerned? We had no difficulty in considering the Clayton bill, which is yet to come before the Senate for formal action, in drawing a clause which will permit a decision in favor of the Government of the United States against any combination to be employed by private parties having a similar complaint against the same concern; but here you write across the face of this bill the words "We fear it ourselves," when you add this clause:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Why? Because you have granted so unlimited a power, so broad a power, so dangerous a power that you are afraid to allow the decree of this tribunal or the finding of this tribunal to be used as even prima facie evidence in any court of justice. You fear your own Frankenstein; you prepare a cage for him before you create him.

I appeal once more to Senators upon the rather low ground—and yet is one that is very practical—do you want to enact a law here so vague and indefinite that you can not understand it, That you can not, and you, and you, and you? Do you want to pass a law of that vague nature, giving no guide to the people of your own States that they can follow, and then compel them, upon the complaint of any person whatsoever to come here to Washington to find out for the first time whether that which they have been doing is legal or illegal?

It is true if you write a perfectly plain law, if you set up reasonable guides for the people to follow, that there may be no great hardship in compelling a man who violates such a law to come to Washington, although I think that a very doubtful proposition; I think it would be better to give him his day in court in his own State; but you set up no law, no rule, no guide, and then say to the people who live upon the shores of the Pacific Ocean, You shall come here whenever complaint is made; you shall come here to answer for practices, although you have no means of knowing whether they are either right or wrong; you shall come here from Arizona, the same as you would come from the District of Columbia itself, and you shall, for the first time, ascertain, not from Congress, not from the law-making body, what is right and what is wrong, but you shall ascertain that fact by asking five men whether you can or can not do a certain thing.

The pride of the Anglo-Saxon race has been that they were governed not by men but by law. That old principle is so thoroughly ingrained, not only in the American citizen but in his ancestry, that it is related that a subject of the great Frederick William, father of Frederick the Great, desired a piece of land belonging to an humble cottager that adjoined the imperial domain. The old German did not want to part with it. They tried every means to persuade him to do so, and finally the Emperor himself said to this old German peasant, "What will you do if I take it?" And the old German turned and looked him in the eye and said, "Your Majesty can not take it while there is law in Prussia." He lived under an almost absolute monarch, and yet he had a law he could appeal to—not the will of a sovereign, not the will of a commission, but a law of the land which protected him in his property—and that law was greater than the will of the imperial monarch of the state.

This is a government of law, not a government of men. Whenever you vest in a board the discretion to control my conduct you take away from me the discretion to control my own conduct. Whenever you vest in a board the power to say what my rights are you take away my rights under the laws, sir. Whenever you give five men the right to condemn a practice of mine, not because there is a written law that condemns it, but because in their own minds they think it is wrong, you have substituted their minds for the law of the land; you have substituted their will for my rights as an American citizen.

Who is there here willing to do that? We do not need to do it. We can establish this commission; we can give it powers broad enough to reach every wrong that has been denounced upon this floor without giving license to do as it pleases, without giving it the power to trample upon our rights, without giving it the power to make its will the supreme law of this land. We can do this under the Constitution. There is no wrong in this land that can not be reached under the Constitution of the United States; there is no wrong in this land so subtle, so powerful, so insidious that we can not reach it by law. We do not need to substitute the will of men for law.

Talk about conferring this power upon a commission. Sir, if arbitrary power is to be conferred, I would rather confer it upon the courts than upon a commission.

Who shall compose this commission? As I have already stated, they may be men in sympathy with every kind of trust and combination. Who will guarantee a different commission? I should be willing to guarantee it for the immediate present, because I have confidence that the President will not impose such men upon us. I say that although I have recently differed from him in regard to one appointment; but who, looking down the years, shall say that the power that has heretofore been able to step into the President's office and arrest the very arm of justice itself, will not be great enough to name this commission. Remember that it is not elected by the people; it is responsible to no one; it is answerable neither to the law of the land nor to a constituency.

Oh, but somebody says, "Some professor somewhere discussed 'unfair competition'"; and we had read here an article from some professor. Prof. William S. Stevens recently wrote an article on unfair competition. He was mentioned as "a Columbia professor," and as an authority so eminent that his writings on this subject should determine the language which should be incorporated in the bill; yet I do not even find his name on the catalogue of the regular faculty of Columbia University. He did appear as a summer-school instructor and extension teacher, unconnected with the regular faculty. I am not saying one word against the gentleman, but he was put forward here as an unanswerable authority, and yet he had this to say in a recent article:

"Unfair competition" is a term difficult either to define or explain. To different individuals it connotes different things.

A fine thing to put into a law; is it not? According to the definition or description of this man, who has been quoted as an eminent authority, we are to put into a law something that means different things to different minds.

The lawyer's view of unfair competition, for example, is based upon the statutes and the decisions of the courts—

I thought so until I heard some of my lawyer friends talk here in this body—that of the economic consequences and results.

There you are. Which school of thought is going to be followed? Then, when you get among the economists, which school of economists are you going to follow?

I continue to read:

To the lawyer, a method which is legal is not unfair. To the economist, on the other hand, legality per se is no criterion of fairness. The opinions of the lawyer and of the economist are therefore likely to be at variance in the case of more than one method. This divergence of views will appear more clearly in the course of this article, which is written from the standpoint of the economist.

And you want to use a term so vague that this gentleman says it means one thing to the lawyer and another thing to the economist, and you all know you would not dare venture a guess as to what it means.

Mr. President, I have taken the time of the Senate, not because I am stubbornly clinging to an idea, but because there is not a man in this body who more than myself desires to destroy those great influences and combinations that are striking free competition in this country. Therefore, I want to write a law that has teeth in it; and the first thing you must do if you are to have a law that is to be effective is to write the law so that when it is read it has a meaning, and that meaning is one which tribunals will enforce.

I am not willing to take the chance of allowing this time to pass, this opportunity to go by, when we can enact a statute which will arrest to a large extent these evil practices. I am sorry so many of my associates take a different view. I offer this amendment, and I ask the Senate to give it a real consideration. I ask you all if it is not better to employ a definition that will form a guide than to proceed without definition and without guide upon an unknown road leading into an unexplored country?

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield while I propose an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLIS. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the proposed amendment by adding, after the word "devices," on line 4, a comma and the words "whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, when the amendment comes under consideration I may ask to say a few words about it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Missouri presents many questions which are inviting to discussion, and, so far as he refers to a speech made by me some time ago, I should be delighted to renew the argument. The hour is late, however, a vote is desired, and the Senate is not interested in any personal controversy between the junior Senator from Missouri and the junior Senator from New Hampshire. I have no doubt every Senator has made up his mind how he will vote. I am therefore willing, somewhat reluctantly, to leave my part of the debate on the record as it now stands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri simply amplifies what is meant by the phrase that it is intended to elucidate. Those of us who think the phrase "unfair competition" is adequate understand that it will be for the commission, subject to review by the courts, to fill in, under the rule of reason, such things as they may find to be unfair competition. Under our contention, therefore, there is no objection to attempting a further definition or an amplification of that particular definition.

Everything that the Senator from Missouri recites in his amendment is conceded by those of us who think that the term is sufficient, and there can be no objection on our part to making a partial enumeration of the things that are included in it.

His amendment is subject, however, I will not say to the criticism but to the objection that after the commission have exhausted the list of instances that are said to constitute unfair competition they are held down by the terms of this amendment, under the general phrase "all other acts or devices done or used with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another," and so forth, to a rule of law known as ejusdem generis; that is to say, the devices that might be considered under that general phrase would be of like nature with those actually mentioned. I would avoid that by adding:

Whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not.

That excludes the idea that the court or commission, in construing the meaning of the phrases indicated, would be confined to those of like nature.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas to give the exact wording of the amendment?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Just after the word "devices," on line 4, add: "whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not."

There is a rule of law, as I say, known as the doctrine of ejusdem generis; that is to say, that where an enumeration of instances is made, and the general phrase is added, "and all other acts or devices," in construing those general words the court will be confined to instances of like nature.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I thought this language out, and thought I had escaped the rule just appealed to by the Senator; but I have such great respect for the opinion of the Senator as a lawyer that if he entertains doubt as to the matter I am willing to resolve that doubt by putting in the language the Senator offers. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then, Mr. President, with that concession by the Senator I am going to vote for the amendment, because it is entirely in line with what all of us have been insisting on. It is just as exhaustive as the general term. The adoption of the amendment would be useful to this extent: It would conclusively exclude the contention that the use of the words "unfair competition" was intended by Congress to be limited to what is known as the passing-off process of substituting the goods of one dealer for those of another.

I think there is no objection to the amendment, and I think it serves a useful purpose; and so far as I am concerned, as a friend of the bill, I am going to vote for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, as modified.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to hear the amendment read as it now stands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. As now proposed, it reads as follows:

SEC. 6. The term "unfair competition," as used in section 5, is hereby defined to embrace all those acts, devices, concealments, threats, coercions, deceits, frauds, dishonest practices, false representations, slanders of business, and all other acts or devices, whether of like nature with those herein enumerated or not, done or used with the intent or calculated to destroy or unreasonably hinder the business of another or prevent another from engaging in business, or to restrain trade or to create a monopoly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the suggestion has been made by some of the Senators on the other side that we should agree upon a time for a vote upon the entire bill.

Mr. REED. Let us vote on this question now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There will have to be some time taken for consideration of this amendment. When the committee last met, the committee determined to stand by the words as used in the bill—"unfair competition"—and I am not prepared at this moment to state what the opinion would be regarding the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

A suggestion has been made upon the other side for a unanimous-consent agreement regarding a vote. It is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 11 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 5, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 15613, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish the Secretary would read the proposed amendment, so that we may all hear it and understand it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, before that is done, I should like to say that the suggestion that was made, so far as this side was concerned, was not that the hour should be 11 o'clock, as I understand, but that it should be 2 o'clock.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; the suggestion as made to me was 11 o'clock. It is true the Senator from Rhode Island suggested 2 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island correctly states the position that some of us hold, that it ought to be 2 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock; and I think if the Senator will make it 2 o'clock there will be no objection on the part of anybody.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All right; let it be changed to read "2 o'clock."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not latter than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 5, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 15613 through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am requested to inquire whether the other side will agree that the final vote shall be taken not later than 6 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr GALLINGER. So far as I know, there is no objection. There may be objection on the part of some of my colleagues; but we are quite anxious to have this bill disposed of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am quite willing that the vote shall be taken at that time. I rose simply to suggest to the Senator that we can not adopt this unanimous-consent agreement without calling the roll and ascertaining that a quorum is present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no doubt that a quorum is present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is about to order a call of the roll for that purpose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If there is any objection to that agreement upon this side, I should like to hear it.

Mr. REED. I should have liked to have a vote upon this amendment to-night, because my course will be somewhat determined by the result, and then take up this other matter. We were ready for a roll call on it. I am not going to object, however. I would not put myself in the position of offering an objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that I do not feel authorized to assent to this amendment without consulting the members of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a question of assent on the part of the Senator from Nevada. It is a question as to whether anybody wants to speak to this amendment or whether the question shall be put to the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST (and other Senators). Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as modified. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I should like to know if the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. OWEN. Being paired with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote, unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been asked to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is necessarily absent, and that if present he would vote "yea."

I have also been asked to announce pairs between the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Brady	Hitchcock	Norris	Stone
Bryan	Jones	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Burton	Kenyon	Overman	Vardaman
Chilton	Lane	Page	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Perkins	Weeks
Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Reed	West
Colt	Myers	Simmons
Gallinger	Nelson	Sterling

NAYS—32.

Ashurst	Hollis	Lippitt	Sheppard
Bristow	Hughes	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Camden	James	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Clapp	Johnson	Newlands	Swanson
Crawford	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Thornton
Fall	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	White
Gronna	Lewis	Shafroth	Williams

NOT VOTING—34.

Bankhead	Fletcher	Poindexter	Smith, S.C.
Borah	Goff	Robinson	Stephenson
Brandegee	Gore	Root	Thomas
Burleigh	La Follette	Sherman	Tillman
Catron	Lodge	Shields	Townsend
Chamberlain	Oliver	Shively	Warren
Culberson	Owen	Smith, Ga.	Works
Dillingham	Penrose	Smith, Md.
du Pont	Pittman	Smith, Mich.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll having been called, and the vote having disclosed the presence of a quorum, the Senator from Nevada presents a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 5, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 15613, an act to create an interstate trade commission, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that the vote upon the passage of the bill as amended shall be taken at not later than 6 o'clock p. m. on the said day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Who offers that agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Is there any objection to the unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and it is accordingly entered as the order of the Senate.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In behalf of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 719) thereon. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to its consideration. I think the bill ought to be printed, and we ought to have an opportunity to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill. It will be printed and placed on the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 3176. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me.; and

S. 6192. An act to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., and a memorial of the Shipowners' Association of the Pacific Coast, remonstrating against foreign-built vessels engaging in the coastwise trade, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Federated Trades and Labor Council of San Diego, Cal., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Berkeley, Cal., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Mount View, of the Congregational Sunday School of Lodi, and of the Pacific Conference of the Epworth Leagues of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Stockton, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of sundry citizens of North Yakima, Wash., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 6211) granting an increase of pension to Aurelia M. Todd (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURTON:

A bill (S. 6212) granting an increase of pension to Harriet L. Willis; and

A bill (S. 6213) granting an increase of pension to Clara R. Squier; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 6215) granting an increase of pension to David W. Mead (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 4, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in whom is all wisdom, power, and goodness, interpose, we beseech Thee, and avert the terrible war which threatens all Europe. Arouse the better angels in the hearts of those in authority and bring them together in reason, justice, and mercy, that their differences may be amicably adjusted by sane and peaceful methods. But, if war must needs come, we pray most earnestly and fervently for the poor, irresponsible, misguided men upon whom will fall the brunt of all the horrors and miseries attendant upon war. And, O Father, shield and protect the helpless women and children, whose sorrows will be beyond compare. Unite us as a people by the strong ties of brotherhood into a more compact union for peace, harmony, and all that makes for good government. Hear us, O God our Father, and answer our petition in the name of Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FIELDS asked unanimous consent for leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. WOODRUFF asked leave of absence, for 30 days, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these requests?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I think I shall not object, although I do not see present the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] who usually objects.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the conference report is not yet ready, and I move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general dam bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to rise when the conference report is ready.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will move to rise when the conference report comes in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16053, the general dam act.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is about to take the gavel.

Mr. MANN. It will not make much difference; we will have to have a call in the committee if not in the House.

The SPEAKER. The only difference is that we have to have 217 Members for a quorum in the House and only 100 in the committee.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his point of order, and the gentleman from Texas will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 16053. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-one Members present—not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Abercrombie	Estopinal	Humphrey, Wash.	Porter

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 16053, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and 235 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

The question was taken; and on a division there were 45 ayes and 69 noes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Clerk may again report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I suggest that the provision of the text be first reported, and then the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, no right to tellers is lost by this proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. No. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the text of the bill and the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the completion of the dam described in the original approval, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until compensation has been made to said grantee for the fair value of its property, as hereinafter provided, or until said rights and privileges are revoked as provided in this act, or until action by Congress shall have provided for the disposition of the project or for extending the consent of Congress and fixing the period of extension, as well as providing such additional terms and conditions of consent as Congress may deem wise.

Amendment by Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire:

"Amend section 9, page 10, by striking out all of said section and substituting in place thereof the following:

"'SEC. 9. That the rights granted herein shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the original approval unless sooner revoked or forfeited, as provided for in this act.'"

The Chair appointed Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire and Mr. ADAMSON to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 79.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand the conference report on the emergency currency measure is ready. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16053, the general dam act, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EMERGENCY CURRENCY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the bill S. 6192, to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the bill S. 6192, without printing under the rules. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Virginia intend to explain how the bill has been changed?

Mr. GLASS. I can do so in a very few minutes, and the reading of the report will do that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to a substitute therefor as follows, to wit: After the word "and," in line 9, page 3, insert: "to suspend also the conditions and limitations of section 5 of said act, except that no bank shall be permitted to issue circulating notes in excess of 125 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus. He shall require each bank and currency association to maintain on deposit in the Treasury of the United States a sum in gold sufficient in his judgment for the redemption of such notes, but in no event less than 5 per cent. He"; after the word "to," line 12, page 3, insert "as herein amended."

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1, and agree to the substitute as above set forth.

CARTER GLASS,
C. A. KORBLY,
E. A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROBERT L. OWEN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report, notwithstanding the rule about going over for one day to be printed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, the alteration in the amendment of the House is a very simple one. There were comprised in section 5 of the Vreeland-Aldrich Act two limitations. One related to the individual bank, requiring that no individual bank should receive emergency notes in excess of its capital stock and surplus; the other related to the gross amount of emergency notes that might be issued. That was fixed at $500,000,000. The House amendment to the Senate proposition left the matter wide open, both as to the gross amount of notes that might be issued and as to the amount of currency that might be received by individual banks. The Senate dissented from the latter proposition and put a limitation upon the amount of currency that may be received by individual banks, making it 25 per cent in excess of the total capitalization and surplus of the bank.

Mr. MURDOCK. And added a gold-reserve feature?

Mr. GLASS. And added a gold-reserve feature in the language of the Federal reserve act. In other words, the 5 per cent current redemption fund in the case of national-bank notes was found to be inadequate, and the Federal reserve act provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, increase the amount in the case of Federal reserve notes. We have simply embodied in this amendment with respect to emergency notes the language of the Federal reserve act with respect to Federal reserve notes. The Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the conferees and recommended that the alteration be made, and gave us a rather more optimistic view of matters than members of the committee had entertained.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This emergency currency is now printed?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it printed under titles of national banks?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to take national-bank notes printed under a bank title, say, in Illinois, and let a New York bank have them?

Mr. GLASS. No; he will have the currency printed for the New York bank.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood the currency was already printed.

Mr. GLASS. Half a billion is already printed. The plates are in existence and additional amounts are being now printed.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The Senate disagreed to both of the House amendments?

Mr. GLASS. No; to only one.

Mr. GARNER. And the conference committee has only to report on one amendment in disagreement?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand the amendment of the Senate which the conferees agreed on, it changes the present law to the extent that the only limitation on a bank's issue is 25 per cent plus its capital and surplus?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That is the only change from the Vreeland law and the present law?

Mr. GLASS. Except to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the amount of the gold redemption fund.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If I understand this correctly, this amendment makes three changes from the existing law. Under existing law the total limitation on the currency which may be issued is $500,000,000, and this takes off the limit entirely.

Mr. GLASS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that under the existing law the amount that may be advanced to any bank can not exceed its capital and surplus, while this authorizes 25 per cent more than the capital and surplus?

Mr. GLASS. To the individual bank; yes.

Mr. MANN. That under existing law there is no gold reserve required?

Mr. GLASS. There is 5 per cent gold redemption fund required.

Mr. MANN. I mean gold redemption fund.

Mr. GLASS. And this authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to increase that.

Mr. MANN. Does the existing law provide for 5 per cent?

Mr. GLASS. It provides for 5 per cent; yes.

The Vreeland-Aldrich Act provides for 5 per cent. The Federal reserve act provides not less than 5 per cent and permits the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to increase the amount.

Mr. MANN. Of course this is not the Federal reserve act, so that has no application——

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. MANN. But the Vreeland-Aldrich Act provides a 5 per cent gold redemption fund?

Mr. GLASS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Each bank which receives these currency notes must put up with the Government 5 per cent of that in gold?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And this authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to increase that amount?

Mr. GLASS. In his discretion; yes.

Mr. MANN. That is the only change made in that respect?

Mr. GLASS. That is the only change, to provide against inflation. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield to one question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. What is the reason for the increase of the amount which the bank may issue to 125 per cent?

Mr. GLASS. Simply to meet the emergency. A good many of the banks, a good many of the national banks——

Mr. GARNER. Country banks.

Mr. GLASS. A good many of the national banks, especially the country banks, are up to the possible amount of their circulation, and this increase of 25 per cent in excess of capital and surplus was a necessary precaution to meet the emergency.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will not this also enable the southern country banks more rapidly and easily to handle and market the crops now coming to market?

Mr. GLASS. And western banks.

Mr. RAGSDALE. And western banks?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any provision made for additional security for the excess of 25 per cent above the capital and surplus of any individual bank?

Mr. GLASS. The same kind of security is required for the excess that is required for the original amount.

Mr. FOWLER. The same as originally provided in the Vreeland-Aldrich bill—the same character and amount of security?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GLASS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill amending the general dam act.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16053, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, lines 10 and 12, strike out "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, the House has already inserted new matter in that section.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. MANN. That there is nothing left of this section except what the committee has inserted by way of amendment, and that can not be amended now.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, while it is true the committee has adopted an amendment with reference to the taking over of the property after 50 years, that does not prevent the committee from considering an amendment to lessen the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary situation, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois, is this: The gentleman from New Hampshire offered an amendment to this section striking out the entire section and substituting certain language for it. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois wanted to amend that amendment and perfect it before it became part of the bill his opportunity existed then. After the amendment is adopted the rules of the committee do not permit the gentleman to offer the amendment; it is finished. That is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, Mr. Chairman, that very parliamentary situation came up here a few days ago in the House on an amendment to a bill after an amendment had already been adopted, and the Chair held that the committee could consider that new amendment offered if it saw fit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that what was held at that time was what the Chair has just stated. An amendment could have been offered to perfect this amendment, but after it is once adopted——

Mr. FOWLER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I think that the advice which the Chair has received does not report correctly the parliamentary situation at that time. If I remember it correctly, an amendment had already been adopted upon a vote and subsequent to that a new amendment was offered to the amendment, which had already been voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he recalls that instance in which an amendment was offered to a paragraph, to perfect the paragraph. After that the motion was made to substitute for another paragraph, which would have been in order. This is an entirely different situation. A substitute was offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire. That substitute was agreed to. No effort was made to perfect the substitute before it was agreed to, and it is too late; and the Clerk will read.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. Was there anything more than simply an amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire which had just been voted on at the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was offered in the nature of a substitute to perfect the entire paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, did it perfect the entire paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It struck out the entire paragraph and substituted other language for it.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not understand that it took out the language of the entire paragraph, but that it only affected certain language of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from Illinois can not offer the amendment now, and the Chair thinks it is useless to further discuss the matter.

Mr. FOWLER. I am going to abide by the decision of the Chair, although I think the Chair is wrong.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. UNDERWOOD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 23) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District, which were, on page 2, line 6, to strike out "and forty-one"; on page 3, line 15, after the word "States," to insert: ": Provided, however, That from such sum or sums as may be awarded to said owners there shall be deducted the compensation and expenses of said commission and the compensation of said jurors."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to an act (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6039. An act for the coinage of certain gold and silver coins in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That any time after the expiration of said 50 years the Secretary of War may terminate the rights hereby granted upon giving to the owners thereof one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States, or by any person authorized by Congress, of all the property dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereby granted, which shall include all necessary and appurtenant property created or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and all other property the value and usefulness of which would be destroyed or seriously impaired by such termination, and upon paying the fair value of said property, together with the cost, to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, and assuming all contracts entered into prior to the receipt by it of said notice of termination which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof, or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances existing at the time such contracts were made. The fair value of said property and the reasonableness and good faith of such contracts shall be determined by agreement between the Secretary of War and the owners of such property, and in the event of their failure to agree, then by proceedings instituted by the United States, or by any person authorized by Congress, in the district court of the United States within which any portion of such dam may be located. In the determination of the value of said property upon the termination of said grant as above provided no value shall be claimed by or allowed for the consent hereby granted, nor for good will, profit in pending contracts, nor other conditions of current or prospective business.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 10, page 10, by striking out the entire section and substituting therefor the following:

"SEC. 10. That upon not less than two years' notice prior to the expiration of any grant made hereunder and at any time after the expiration of such grant upon six months' notice the United States, or any person authorized by Congress, shall have the right to take over all of the property of the grantee necessary and useful for the generation, transmission, or distribution of power. Such property shall include the lands or interests in lands acquired or used for the purposes of the development and transmission of power, the dam and other structures and the equipment necessary and useful for the generation of power, and the transmission system from generation plant to initial points of distribution, and the lock or locks or other aids to navigation, but shall not include any other property whatsoever. Before taking possession the United States or the person authorized by Congress shall pay therefor (1) the actual cost to the grantee of lands or any interests therein purchased and used by the grantee in the generation and distribution of power, and (2) the fair value of the other properties taken over, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States in assuming all contracts for electrical energy extending beyond the granting period which have had or may have the approval of the Secretary of War and which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate. The actual cost of land or interests therein and the fair value of other property shall be determined by agreement between the Secretary of War and the owners of such property, and in the event of their failure to agree, then by proceedings instituted by the United States or by the person authorized by the United States in the district court of the United States within which any portion of such dam may be located. In determining the fair value of the property other than lands or interests in lands, allowance shall be made for deterioration, if any, of the existing structures and transmission lines, and no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted, for good will, going concern, profit in pending contracts for electrical energy, or for other conditions of current or prospective business, or for any other intangible element."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That in all cases where the electric current generated from or by any of the projects provided for in this act shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce, the rates, charges, and service for the same to the consumers thereof shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable and unduly discriminatory charge, rate, or service therefor is hereby prohibited and declared to be illegal; and whenever the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that the rates or charges demanded or collected on the service rendered for such electric current are unjust, unreasonable, or unduly discriminatory, upon complaint made therefor and full hearing thereon the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be the just and reasonable rates and charges therefor to be observed as the maximum to be charged and the service to be rendered; and in case of the violation of any such order of the Secretary of War the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply. That in the valuation for rate-making purposes of the property existing under said approval of the project there may be considered any lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States.

The Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to include among the conditions for his approval of any plans or any project herein provided, as an express condition thereof, a clause reserving to the Secretary of War the same rights, powers, and duties set forth in this section, together with the same penalty for violation thereof: Provided, That whenever the State in which such current shall be used shall have provided by law adequate regulation for rates, charges, and service to the consumers for such electric current and such regulation shall not be unduly discriminatory or unjust against the service or charges in any other State arising from the use of the power from the same project, and such facts shall be established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then in such case the provisions of this section shall not apply to the rates, charges, and service in and for such State.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. UNDERWOOD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire and Mr. THOMSON of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 5, after the words "United States," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following:

"But no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted, for good will, going concern, or any other intangible value."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 8, after "11," strike out section 11 and insert:

"That all charges, rates, and service by any grantee or lessee hereunder, or connecting company engaged in the transmission and sale of power and electric current generated by any project subject to the provisions of this act, shall be reasonable, adequate, without discrimination, and subject to the regulations of the Secretary of War. To enforce such just and reasonable and nondiscriminatory charges and secure adequate and efficient service to consumers, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe and examine reports and systems of account, books, and other records, establish standards, and make tests of service, control the issuance of stocks and bonds by corporations engaged in the generation, transmission, or sale of such hydroelectric product, and require them to submit statements of all costs of property, production distribution, sale, and use of product, subject to such grant or lease and connected with such project, furnishing such information upon oath or by witness or in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of War may order and require; and on complaint of any State, municipality, or consumers affected thereby, and full hearing thereon, the Secretary of War is empowered to determine and prescribe the maximum rates to be charged, based on fair and reasonable returns on the valuation of the property and cost of operation, and ascertain and order the requirements of service to be rendered; and in case of any violation of such orders of the Secretary of War or the refusal of such grantee or lessee to give the Secretary of War and his legal representatives full access to its property and records, the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply. It is herewith provided, however:

"(a) That when a State in which such water power and electric current is used shall notify the Secretary of War of the passage of laws and the perfecting of administration to effectively provide for such regulation of rates, charges, and service within such State and its municipal subdivisions, the regulations of the Secretary of War shall not apply to local and intrastate business therein.

"(b) That when the power generated by such project enters both interstate and intrastate commerce, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to join with any State in which such power is used in effecting such joint and interlocking system of Federal and State regulation as in its judgment shall most effectively promote the general public interest and carry out the purposes of this act.

"(c) That in such valuation for rate-making purposes of the property operated under such grant there may be considered by the Secretary of War any lock or other aid to navigation, including all capital expenditures required of the grantee by the United States, but no value shall be allowed for the good will or franchise value of the lease or permit hereby or heretofore granted."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman a minute? How much time does he desire?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I would like 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there never has been a subject in the world talked about as much as this. Every single angle of it has been debated, and I hope that gentlemen will offer the amendments and vote on them, and let us get through. I am willing to vote on the amendment right now, and am willing to have them adopt this amendment, if they want to do so. There is no difference except that he has a thousand or so words that mean the same thing, practically. Let us limit the debate or vote at once. I do not care to hear anybody talk 15 minutes on it.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Georgia has not exhausted himself, and we gave him unlimited time the other day.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I spoke 15 minutes in reply to 6 weeks of unending oratory.

Mr. MANN. We gave the gentleman unlimited time under the five-minute rule the other day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is 15 minutes all the gentleman from Minnesota desires?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. That is all I want.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 20 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota to have 10 and those in opposition to have the same amount of time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Minnesota wants 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think 5 minutes on a side would be enough.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Can not the gentleman compromise on 10 minutes?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may have 10 minutes, that there may be 5 minutes in opposition, and that all debate close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments close in 15 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 5 minutes by those opposed to the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Reserving the right to object, who is included in that 5 minutes on this side?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Anybody who is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois may have my time if he wants it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Reserving the right to object, this amendment covers many different subjects. For instance, there is a paragraph about accounting and reports on the projects. I would like to know if there is 15 or 20 minutes debate on a side on this substitute, which covers a very wide range of subjects, the Chairman is going to object to debate on some of the same things that will be brought up separately later?

Mr. ADAMSON. I take it for granted that the House ought to vote this down without any debate if the gentlemen do not care to waste time on it.

Mr. MANN. Do not let us have any misunderstanding. The request is to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. ADAMSON. In 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I object to that request. There may be other amendments to be debated.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana want?

Mr. CULLOP. I do not know until the amendments are offered. If you restrict the request to this amendment, we will not have any objection; but if it is to go to all amendments, we do object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to get this bill out of the House to-day. I really want to agree to latitude of debate, but unless we can agree upon a reasonable length of debate I shall insist upon the observance of the rule that all speeches be limited to five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, the gentleman himself had 15 minutes two or three times.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, we have to get the bill out.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, is the question of objecting or not objecting before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to limit debate on this section and amendments thereto to 15 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Then I wish to reserve the right to object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the request, Mr. Chairman, on the gentleman's amendment, that he may have 10 minutes and the opposition to it 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 15 minutes, 10 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] and 5 minutes to be used by the opposition. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I beg leave to say a word in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has more than once urged the necessity of passing this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. That has nothing to do with the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is to strengthen and give force and effect to section 11 of the pending bill, which has to do with regulation of hydroelectric projects. I am not at all surprised at the statement of the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON] that the amendment will be voted down whether there is debate or not, because Mr. ADAMSON and myself hold different views as to what constitutes the paramount features of this legislation. The chairman of the committee holds that the legislation should be sufficiently liberal to induce capital to invest in such enterprises, which purpose is clearly indicated by the following colloquy that took place at the hearings before Mr. ADAMSON'S committee on April 14, 1914, between Mr. Cooper and the chairman of the committee, to wit:

Mr. Cooper on the stand:

The CHAIRMAN. What is the reason that this will not do? If it is entirely within the jurisdiction of a State, let the State do what it pleases.

Mr. COOPER. I am afraid of any State.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose that we provide that if the State does not provide adequate legislation that the Government reserve the right to do it and they can not confiscate your property by making the rate too low?

Mr. COOPER. That is all I ask.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we are about of the opinion to do that.

I am not so much concerned about making the bill so liberal that capital will be induced to invest in the enterprise as I am that there shall be an adequate scheme of just regulation for the benefit of the public as well as to prevent the great natural resources from being absorbed—free from efficient public control—by the Hydroelectric Trust. The provision in the pending bill—

That whenever the State in which such current shall be used shall have provided by law adequate regulation for rates, charges, and services to the consumer for such electric current and such regulation shall not be unduly discriminatory or unjust against the service or charges in any other State arising from the use of the power from the same project, and such facts shall be established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then in such cases the provisions of this section—

Meaning the provisions authorizing the Secretary of War to fix rates and charges—shall not apply to the rates, charges, and services in and for such State—was evidently inserted with the view of depriving States of their right to control rates, charges, and so forth, and was inspired by Mr. Cooper, or men of his point of view.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to tell him that this section was written before Mr. Cooper appeared before the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Well, it bears the earmarks very strongly of Mr. Cooper's suggestion.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a good deal of imagination.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman right there what Mr. Cooper that was?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Hugh L. Cooper, who built the Keokuk Dam.

Mr. COOPER. In view of the question asked, I would like to have it distinctly understood that he is not a relative of mine and that I have no relative connected with this project.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. What is the object of the provision which provides that "such regulation shall not be unduly discriminatory or unjust against the services or charges in any other State arising from the use of the power from the same project" unless it is to make the Secretary of War a buffer between the Hydroelectric Trust and the State commissions? Moreover, this view is in line with what Mr. Cooper suggested when he stated that the Hydroelectric Trust was afraid of the State but was not afraid of Congress, and is also in line with the thought of the chairman of the committee when he explained that the committee intended to fix it so that the State "could not confiscate" the property of the trust. If I am correct in my observation, section 11 will accomplish the desired object and the Hydroelectric Trust may appropriate all the water-power resources free from efficient public control, except the control that prohibits the State from confiscating the property of the trust. My amendment is offered with a view to making impossible such a contingency. Control of public-service corporations is by no means new legislation. As early as 1869 Massachusetts had for common carriers the system in operation, and for gas and electricity since 1885. New York and Wisconsin have gained prominence in legislation of this sort. At the present time about 20 States have comprehensive measures designed to curb the power of public-service corporations. These corporations have come to be looked upon as public servants free from all the immunities of private property and subject to regulatory control.

The problem before Congress is the working out of that control on an efficient and equitable basis. This task should not be difficult because the States have blazed the way and Congress itself has passed one of the most efficient and comprehensive measures on the subject ever placed on the statute books of any State or nation. I have reference to the interstate-commerce act, which was the product of many sessions and many minds. No law in the history of the world has stood the test against such powerful, bitter, and resourceful enemies as the Sherman antitrust law. There are certain well-established and indispensable features in the Sherman law, as well as in nearly all the State laws on this subject, and strange as it may seem, those universally recognized cardinal principles necessary to efficient regulation are not incorporated in the committee bill.

The Secretary of War, who has control under the pending bill, is not required to keep informed as to general conditions and service of hydroelectric projects under his jurisdiction and has no express power of examination to ascertain the same; neither has he power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses, the production of books and papers, and to enter upon the property for the purpose of investigation; no power to proceed upon his own motion to investigate the rates, quality, standard, adequacy, and security of any hydroelectric project, or of any act done or omitted to be done by such utility company contrary to law or to any order which he may make; no power to make an examination or investigation in case of accidents. He is not required to provide for a comprehensive classification of service and to insist upon each public utility conforming to such classification. He is not required to compel adequate service and just and reasonable rates; no power to insist that before a change in rates or service can be made that he must approve the same; has no power to insist that the accounts, papers, and information in the possession of public-service corporations must be opened for inspection by himself or his duly authorized agents; has no power to require a uniform system of accounting; has no jurisdiction or power over the issue of stock or bonds; is not required or authorized to value property of projects; there is no provision authorizing a rehearing or providing that if a rehearing is had it shall not stay the operation of his order; he is not authorized or required to compel electric companies to make uniform reports showing capitalization, financial transactions, receipts, expenditures, dividends, salaries and wages, location and description of its property, and such other facts as he might deem necessary; there is no provision for court review or appeal from the decision of the Secretary.

The object of my amendment is to supply these well-recognized essential features so indispensable to any system of efficient regulation. The first paragraph of my amendment, which reads as follows—

That all charges, rates, and services by any grantee or lessee hereunder, or connecting company engaged in the transmission and sale of power and electric current generated by any project subject to the provisions of this act, shall be reasonable, adequate, without discrimination, and subject to the regulation of the Secretary of War—

provides that connecting companies, such as the Mississippi Power Distributing Co., located within a few miles of St. Louis, will be under the control of the Secretary of War as effectively as the original project, thus extending the power to regulate rates and service over subsidiary companies and connecting companies. If some such feature as this is not adopted the grantee can escape regulation through connecting and subsidiary companies.

The second paragraph provides that the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered—to prescribe and examine reports and systems of accounts, books, and other records, establish standards and make tests of service, control the issue of stocks and bonds of corporations engaged in the generation, transmission, or sale of such hydroelectric product, and require them to submit statements of all costs of property, production, distribution, sale, and use of products, subject to such grant or lease and connected with such project, furnishing such information on oath or by witness or in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of War may order and require; and on the complaint of any State, municipality, or consumers affected thereby, after full hearing thereon, the Secretary of War is empowered to determine and prescribe the maximum rates to be charged, based on fair and reasonable returns on the valuation of the property and cost of operation, and ascertain and order the requirements of service to be rendered; and in case of any violation of such orders of the Secretary of War or the refusal of such grantee or lessee to give the Secretary of War or his agent full access to its property and records, the provisions of the act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply.

This paragraph of the amendment provides for a system of regulation such as has been worked out and adopted after years of experience and study by the States and the Nation covering the general subject of supervision of accounts, reports, service tests and standards, control of stock and bond issues, to compel witnesses to attend and testify, right of an individual, State, or municipality to demand a hearing, method of determining value of property as basis for rate making, full access to property and records, and an effective method of enforcing the regulation.

The third paragraph of the amendment is as follows:

That when a State in which such water power and electric current is used shall notify the Secretary of War of the passage of laws and the perfecting of administration to efficiently provide for such regulation of rates, charges, and service within such State and its municipal subdivisions the regulations of the Secretary shall not apply to local and intrastate business therein.

Thus the Secretary is to refrain from exercising control over rates and charges affecting local and interstate business when the State notifies him that the State is ready to take over the control. The provision in the committee bill relating to this subject is unique and far-reaching in its attempt to supplant control by the States.

The Secretary of War, endowed with paternalistic power, may grant to the States, if he is so disposed, after being fully satisfied that it is the part of wisdom so to do, the privilege of regulating their own internal affairs in respect to rates, charges, and service to the consumers for such electric current. Not since the days of George III has there been so flagrant an attempt to delegate to an individual or a number of individuals the right to pass upon the wisdom or adequacy of ordinances and laws passed by the people for the regulation of their local affairs as is attempted in the committee bill. It has been the policy of this country ever since 1776 to permit the people themselves to judge of the adequacy and justness of the laws of their making. It is fortunate indeed for the people of the United States at this juncture, when the entire water resources of the 48 States and the Nation at large are at stake, the potential income of which may reach hundreds of millions of dollars per annum for generations to come; it is fortunate, I say, that we have in this Nation an official who is eminently and signally competent not only to regulate hydroelectric lightings in their countless public-service ramifications throughout the length and breadth of the greatest empire on earth, but likewise to review the laws and constitutions of these States and determine that which is nondiscriminatory, adequate, just, safe, and sane.

The fourth and last paragraph of my amendment provides—

That when the power generated by such project enters both interstate and intrastate commerce the Secretary of War is authorized to join with any State in which such power is used in effecting such joint and interlocking system of Federal and State regulation as in its judgment shall most effectively promote general public interest and carry out the purpose of this act.

Without some such provision providing for a system of Federal and State regulation any attempt to regulate hydroelectric projects would be of but little value, since most hydroelectric projects involve both interstate and intrastate business. The physical combination of plants, which is permissible under this bill, together with the ability to transmit current from individual plants from 200 to 300 miles, enables hydroelectric projects to combine and distribute electric current over an area of at least 100 000 square miles. Therefore, in order to have efficient regulation, the Federal and State jurisdiction must be joint and interlocking or there will be a twilight zone of no regulation. The objection that I have to section 11 is that it is not sufficiently broad and comprehensive to effectively regulate hydroelectric current. The regulation provided for in the committee bill in respect to this particular feature of the subject might be ample if it were simply to apply to steam, which can not be transmitted but a short distance, hence offering no incentive to combine steam plants into great systems such as the power of transmission of electric current enables hydroelectric projects to economically combine and assist each other and to extend their operations in many cases over three or four States.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] may have five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not pretend that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] is without some value, for no doubt it has good things in it, and no doubt its purposes are well founded and well intended. But we have modified this bill to a marked degree in several instances. In the first place, we have provided that a charge shall be paid. In the second place, we have amended the bill so that there is a 50-year term, and no more. In the third place, we have modified the recapture clause until, in my judgment, it is quite sufficient; and now to accept carte blanche a two-page document to serve as an amendment to one of these sections is more than I think the friends of the bill who want legislation ought to accept.

I think the section as prepared is pretty well arranged. It has been carefully considered by the committee, and in any event no one can grasp the purport of the amendment offered. It has not been printed. Few, if any, Members have seen it. It is too much to expect that it should be accepted.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. What does the gentleman consider the first or principal section in this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. There are several. The term is perhaps the most fundamental of all of them, and the next is our ability to get the property back, and perhaps the third is the charge, or what is known as the Sherley amendment. The fourth would perhaps be regulation, and after a higher state of development it may be advanced to first importance.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Has the gentleman ever thought that the recapture of the project is postponed for 50 years, and that we and our children will get no benefit of that; but if you have proper and suitable regulations you and I will get the benefit of it now? That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the gentleman really conceives the proposition of the gentlemen on the other side. A very distinguished gentleman on the other side of the House the other day announced that real conservation was refrigeration. Now, if the gentleman will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], we shall have real refrigeration.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, for one I do not desire to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota; neither do I desire to accept any amendment that will make this bill unworkable. Surely those who feel keenly the public interest ought not to accept amendments that will make this bill totally unworkable. I know that those who have had the public interest in mind in this and other legislation have had it charged against them that the only thing they desire to do is to tie up things so that they can not be used. I contend for those who feel about conservation as I do that no such thought is intended, no such result contemplated, and I believe that the highest form of conservation is the highest form of use in the public interest; but I do not want to get into that general subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. This is for regulation.

Mr. FERRIS. This has to do with regulation, and whether this section of the bill is all that it should be or not I am not this moment prepared to say; but this is not the last word on the question. This bill will go to the Senate and will probably be rewritten in toto, and we will probably again in this House examine it section by section in toto. To accept an amendment now which may or may not contain duplications of other sections would be more than the real friends of this legislation ought to stand for. I do not want this bill destroyed. No one who has the interest of the country at heart wants the bill destroyed. Neither do I want the progress and development of water-power legislation arrested. It is one of the biggest questions in the field to-day. It is a question not too large for our best thinkers. At the end of 50 years the water-power question will be bigger than Standard Oil or any other fuel question, because the water power is not destroyed as the water runs over these dams. The water power is not consumed like coal and oil and other fuel, but it goes on forever. So we ought all to be exceedingly careful of what we do here to-day. At the same time we ought not to accept any amendment which will make this bill a pile of rubbish and will send it to the Senate as such, and absolutely override the good work that has been done on this bill. I want it a good bill; I want it to pass. I do not want to accept undigested amendments which may weaken the bill.

I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Minnesota) there were—ayes 19, noes 31.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Minnesota was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 11 by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof to read as follows:

"The Secretary of War shall have the right to provide rules and regulations for uniform accounting, to examine all books and accounts of grantees under the terms of this act; to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, annual or special, including full information as to assets and liabilities, capitalization, cost of project, cost of operation the production, use, transmission, and sale of power. All such statements, representations, and reports shall be upon oath unless otherwise specified, and in such forms and on such blanks as the Secretary of War may require; and any person making any false entry, statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to that amendment. I think it is a good one.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can we not dispose of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Minnesota is willing. The gentleman is entitled to five minutes on this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. If debate is desired, I should like to get some agreement as to time. I thought when we agreed to the amendment we would get rid of the talk.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see this amendment offered. In a measure it covers what I sought in my amendment. It does not go quite as far, but I believe it will be beneficial to the bill to have it adopted. I do not think it will add to the rubbish of the bill, as suggested by our distinguished friend from Oklahoma. I do not believe that any Member of this House is going to lumber up a proposition of such great magnitude and of such great importance to this country with rubbish or anything that is going to affect the bill detrimentally. But, on the other hand, I do believe that the membership of the House is desirous of getting the best bill possible, and if they will use their patience and a little mutual respect for each other's opinions, we will be able to draft and pass a bill that will be a credit to this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 13 by striking out lines 6 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, section 11, beginning on page 12, gives the Secretary of War certain rights and powers in the way of regulation in all cases where electric current enters into interstate commerce. Over in the portion of the section that I move to strike out it says that the Secretary may incorporate that power as a condition to the grant in connection with the original approval. Then it goes on to say that wherever the State in which such current shall be used shall provide by law adequate regulation he shall not have that power. It seems to me that would mean that if the electric current entered into interstate commerce and was used in two or more States and each one of those States complied with the last part of the paragraph, which I move to strike out, the Secretary of War would have no power in the way of regulation of rates, and the result might be that one company would generate power used in two or three adjoining States where one State might have one rate and another State another. I believe if this paragraph goes out the Secretary of War will have full power, as given in the first part of the section, to regulate these rates and the power that he ought to have.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wherever the words "Secretary of War" occur in section 11 strike the same out and insert in lieu thereof the words "Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that if my amendment is agreed to it would require a change in other sections of the bill to correspond with the proposed amendment. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this bill, if passed with the powers now vested in it, will practically organize a court for the purpose of passing upon not only the feasibility of the construction of dams, but the letting of the same, and it will take in also the idea of regulation. In order to regulate you must have a hearing, and in order to have a hearing you must have a decision on the hearing, and that is practically a court.

I do not believe that anyone desires in anywise whatever to curtail the power of the Secretary of War. I have no such desire, but for my own part I never could see why the navigable rivers of the country should be placed under the War Department. It would be more practical to have them under the Navy Department, because the Navy primarily deals with water, although corporations sometimes deal with water.

If we pass this bill there will be the greatest reason for fixing and regulating the charges of the various businesses operated by hydroelectric power. There will be the greatest necessity of having an independent body to pass upon that question, the same as is done now with railroad rates, so that the people can get a fair opportunity to present the equities that may arise.

For that reason I have no doubt in my mind but that the Interstate Commerce Commission, the greatest independent body now in existence, should be designated for the purpose of taking charge of this whole question of regulating rates, letting contracts for dams, and supervising the application of electric energy to municipalities, corporations, and individuals. It is not going to be a little affair. We all know that. We realize that in the future there is probably going to be the greatest demand for hydroelectric power of any power known to man. I believe it will be the most useful as well as the most profitable; in fact, I believe it is going to spread out over the entire business world and become the motor power, not only for driving wheels on rivers and on railways, but it is going to be able to drive wheels in the production of the finished product. It will not only do that, but it will drive wheels to produce the raw material. I believe that the farmer in the near future will be bidding for this hydroelectric power for the purpose of producing wheat and corn and other cereals that we stand so much in need of. If that is true, then we ought to have it placed in the hands of some independent body where the rights of the people can properly be taken care of.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Is there anything in this bill that provides for regulation in the case where a company is organized under the bill to produce electric energy and then a subsidiary or other company is a purchaser of that energy and purveys it to the consumers? Is there anything in the bill to give the Secretary of War the power of regulation over the charges which the subsidiary company may impose upon the consumer?

Mr. ADAMSON. My idea is that section 11 gives the Secretary of War control of the situation. If they undertook a subterfuge through a subsidiary company, I think it would be detected and thwarted.

Mr. HULINGS. Suppose it sold it to your company and you had a company for the purpose of purveying energy, has the Secretary of War any right under this bill of regulation of charges which you may impose? I do not believe it is in this section.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think he would have that power over it.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think the first lines of section 11 would answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and it seems to me those lines indicate that if this electricity is generated from any of these water-power projects, it could be controlled.

Mr. HULINGS. I wondered if it would.

Mr. ADAMSON. That was the opinion of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the grantee shall commence the construction of the dam and accessory works within one year from the date of the approval herein provided, and shall thereafter, in good faith and with due diligence, prosecute such construction, and shall, within the further term of three years, complete and put in commercial operation such part of the ultimate development as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall deem necessary to supply the reasonable needs of the then available market, and shall, from time to time thereafter, construct such portion of the balance of such ultimate development as said Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers may direct and within the time specified by said Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers so as to supply adequately the reasonable market demands until such ultimate development shall be completed; and extensions of the periods herein specified, not to exceed two years, may be granted by the Secretary of War, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, when, in his judgment, the public interest will be promoted thereby. In case the grantee shall not commence actual construction within the time herein prescribed, or as extended by the Secretary of War, then the authority as to such grantee shall terminate, and in case any dam and accessory works be not completed within the time herein specified or extended as herein provided, then the Attorney General, upon the request of the Secretary of War, shall institute proper proceedings in the proper district court of the United States for the revocation of said authority, the sale of the works constructed, and such other equitable relief as the case may demand, as provided for in section 8 of this act.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 14, line 3, by adding, after the word "shall," the following: "within such times as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall prescribe."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, as the committee seems willing to accept all amendments, hoping that the Senate will make a good bill out of this, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in line 3, on page 15, the bill refers to "section 8" of the bill. In remodeling this bill, in clipping from the water-power bill introduced in the Senate, and sticking the parts so clipped into the general dam bill, as they do right along, they did not even take the trouble to change the number of the section. There is no section "8" in this bill that this could possibly relate to, but there is such a section "8" in the Rome G. Brown bill—the bill approved also by the other water-power lawyers in this country, which has been so liberally adopted in these italicized amendments here. I want to suggest to the committee, if it is not too late now, inasmuch as the paste-pot method of making this bill has resulted in this absurdity, that they make some change here now.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to reply to that most chaste and eloquent speech.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is right in that it should be section 7 instead of section 8. The committee did make several changes, and did have several bills before it, and we adopted as we supposed the best efforts of every one. But, Mr. Chairman, I think that statement comes in ill grace from a Member who has made statements on this floor, nearly every one of which has been inaccurate, as is proved by the official RECORD of this Government. Practically every statement made——

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman call attention to some of them that are inaccurate?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; the statement that the Keokuk Dam had not been inspected. It was inspected all of the time.

Mr. RAINEY. I made no such statement.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The RECORD shows it, and the people on this floor heard it.

Mr. RAINEY. You will find no such statement.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Hold on——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Illinois repeats that error again, I want to state right here that I never saw this "Jerome Brown," or whatever his name is, in my life, and I do not know who he is, and I do not care.

Mr. RAINEY. This is taken from his bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not believe that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the bill that came from the Senate, as I have informed the House, was sent to me by the senior Senator from the State of Minnesota, Senator NELSON, a man who needs no commendation from me or anyone else who knows his record in this House and in the other House. He has been the chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Public Lands and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and he has given more study to and knows more about this general subject of water-power development than any man in this Congress. And when he sends me a bill I give it the greatest credence and utmost thought. He sent the bill to me, and I am very glad to have adopted some clauses in it, and I am very glad to assume the responsibility and to place it. Senator NELSON, no doubt, can answer for himself, and he needs no defense against the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], whose record is shown in this debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if that is an error, I think it ought to be corrected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is an error.

Mr. ADAMSON. How should it be corrected?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I move that we substitute "7" instead of "8."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have made certain statements with reference to the Keokuk Dam. I call attention to this paragraph of this bill and to the erroneous insertion here of section "8." The bill the gentleman clipped these sections from—and this is not the only section he clipped—is the bill that meets with the approval of Mr. Rome G. Brown and all of these other water-power lawyers. Twelve of them started out by attending these sessions and by smiling approval down from this gallery when we started considering this bill. They have all gone now, because the policy is to pass this on up to the Senate and let the Senate make a bill. The statements I made with reference to the Keokuk Dam are these: That without authority of law the Secretary of War permitted the erection of piers in order to build a bridge——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the fact is that there never was a bridge built. That is one of the gentleman's inaccurate statements.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota has not the right to take the floor and inject remarks without the consent of the Chair or the gentleman who is addressing the Chair.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman answers that by saying that no bridge has been built.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I have stated it, that the gentleman from Minnesota has no right to inject remarks without the consent of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman answers by saying that no bridge has been built. That is his way of begging the question. Of course no bridge has been built there; I did not so state and I have never made that statement, but the piers stand there 175 feet apart, a menace to the navigation of the river. Without any authority of law they have been erected there because this company building this dam wanted to build them. Now, they are there to-day, and the gentleman will not deny that. They are there, and they are asking now his own committee for permission to build a bridge across those piers, and the bill is pending before his committee, and the gentleman will not deny that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Does the gentleman deny that statement?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not by that company, but by the citizens of Keokuk. They are the ones who are asking this permission, not this company.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, the gentleman finds that way of getting out of his expressions.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. No; not for the present. I am not representing the Keokuk Dam Co. upon this floor; I am representing the taxpayers of Illinois; I am representing the people of Illinois who are being oppressed by this company, and that is my reason for speaking here against it. I called attention to the fact that they have impounded water there in the nighttime so as to interfere with the navigation of this river, and I produced here letters from the steamboat companies to prove that they had impaired the navigation of the river below the dam. Now, those two statements have been admitted by the gentleman and he admits that from this water-power bill to which I called attention he took this clause and did not even revise it enough to correct this section number. He admits all these things, and yet he gets up on the floor and says every statement I have made is false and is not sustained by the facts.

I can not understand the mental processes of the gentleman from Minnesota when he makes these charges, in view of the fact he has just admitted everything I stated in regard to the Keokuk Dam. The statements I have made are facts and can not be denied by him or anybody else. The evidence taken by his own committee shows the facts to be as I have stated. But the objection has been frequently made during this debate that we are not legislating for Keokuk, but for the whole country. What has been done at Keokuk can be done anywhere in this country. When you remedy conditions at Keokuk you make impossible those conditions elsewhere.

[Mr. BURNETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, some time ago a gentleman representing a bridge company—I believe it was the Carnegie Bridge Co., although I am not sure of the name of it——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is owned by Carnegie.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Called upon me to make objection to the construction of a bridge by the Keokuk Power Co. and explained to me that, while his bridge company had been in the past unwilling to reconstruct and make a proper bridge, and that they had a good deal of a rattletrap of a bridge, they were very much opposed indeed to letting the Keokuk Power Co. construct a bridge, which would be a modern, up-to-date bridge, and which would put them out of business. I did not know anything about the situation, and I do not know any more now. But all of the statements which my friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has repeatedly made on the floor of the House were made to me at that time by this gentleman representing this old rattletrap bridge.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] says that he does not represent the Keokuk Power Co., and I do not believe that he does, and I do not believe that he represents the bridge company, but I suspect that very much of the information which has been furnished to him has been furnished to him in the interests of the bridge company and for the purpose of saving the Carnegie bonds, if they are still owned by Carnegie, of the bridge company, which would be rendered useless and valueless if another bridge were built at that point.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAINEY. I say to my colleague that the information that these piers are dangerous and only 175 feet apart and imperil steamboats on the river was furnished me by numerous letters received from the steamboat companies operating on the river. I do not care how many bridges they put there, or piers that they build, if Congress consents to it, but this body will never agree that piers be erected there in the fore bay that will imperil navigation on the river.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt whatever that this bridge company in the effort to protect its own special interests and to maintain a monopoly of transit by bridge at that point over the river has been very active in every direction, and included in these directions it has been very active with the shipping interests, or the steamboat interests, on the Mississippi River. You can send out a letter to-day addressed to the captains of the steamboats anywhere in the world in reference to some particular thing by which they pass and get a practically unanimous opinion on their part either for or against something, whichever way you happen to write the letter. I do not know whether the navigation interests there have been interfered with or not. I know there are not enough navigation interests on that part of the Mississippi River to cut much ice one way or the other. But I hope that out of this the people there will be given a decent bridge, either by giving the Keokuk company a right to build a bridge or enforcing the Carnegie right to build a bridge.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to confirm the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota that in the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] when this bill was up under general debate he did not make one statement of fact, amongst all the statements he made, in regard to the development of the water power at Keokuk. The gentleman seems to have changed front since two years ago. On this floor then he made the statement that this Mississippi River Power Co. was disposing of about a one-thousandth part of its power to St. Louis, for which it was receiving sufficient return to mean a fair return on the entire investment. It was a bonanza at that time. In his speech the other day he went on to say it was merely a bubble; that this company had faked the investing public, and to prove that he printed a letter from the Chief of Engineers in which he quoted from a letter received from Maj. Hoffman, in charge of the river improvement in that territory, stating that they could develop 77,000 horsepower in low water without storing water. But the gentleman failed to state that only half of the power is developed at the present time, and only 15 of the 30 turbines are installed; and the statement made by Maj. Hoffman is not at all in conflict with the statement made by the water power company, that they can generate 200,000 delivered horsepower. The gentleman also made the statement that this power company was building a bridge or assumed to build a bridge without any authority from Congress or anybody else. As a matter of fact, the War Department held that under the bridge charter, in that clause providing for building appurtenances to the dam, they were permitted to build a bridge for their own use, to get material back and forth from the power house. They put the piers in while the cofferdam was there, so that water did not interfere. They never claimed that they had a right to build a bridge for interstate commerce.

The War Department never claimed they had any such privilege, and I propose to print, if I am permitted to do so, a statement to that effect from the War Department. As a matter of fact, I introduced a bridge bill known as the "Intercity bridge bill." I did it at the request of the Intercity Bridge Co., made up of citizens of Keokuk and Hamilton, business men who were interested in the development of that territory.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. I absolutely know that the members of this Intercity Bridge Co. labored for months and months with the water-power company to get the privilege, if they could get a franchise from Congress, to use that dam as a bridge. And they hung out for months and months, but finally did give in at the urgent request of this Intercity Bridge Co., which was made up of citizens of those two cities interested in better bridge facilities.

The gentleman from Illinois, in his talk in the general debate on this subject, said that he had written to 104 boat companies that operated on that part of the river. If the gentleman had made any investigation at all, he would have found there are only three boat companies that operate on that reach of the river centering at Keokuk, namely, the Streckfus Line, the Wisherd Line, and the Blair Line. The Streckfus Line operates three boats from St. Louis to St. Paul; the Blair Line operates one daily packet from Keokuk to Quincy and one from Keokuk to Burlington; the Wisherd Line runs an excursion boat. That is the extent of the 104 boat companies which the gentleman claims he was in correspondence with.

And he also states that the building of the dam has very seriously interfered with navigation below the dam. I have it from the War Department that there has not been one single complaint this summer from the navigation interests with respect to the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not going to object, Mr. Chairman, but every particle of this debate is contrary to the rule. I think we ought to have a vote as to whether we shall substitute "7" for "8," but I shall not object to my friend continuing.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there was some little difficulty when they first got to storing water above the dam, but it lasted only for 10 days or 2 weeks, and that was last summer. Since then there has not been a word of complaint received from the navigation interests, and the Chief of Engineers has made a statement in his memorandum to the Secretary of War bearing on this subject which I will insert if I am permitted to. It absolutely disproves the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that the policy of storing water will interfere with navigation in any degree.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Everyone has the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, can we not come to an agreement about limiting the debate?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I make that motion, Mr. Chairman, in order to make some general remarks.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, we have had general remarks for two weeks. I hope we can get along.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. There have been certain phases of this bill that have not been discussed for a moment, and the gentlemen in charge of this bill evidently do not care whether it is discussed or not, because they are relying on the Senate committee to put the bill into shape. But I say there are a few phases of this bill that ought to be discussed, and I want to discuss them.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has repeated an erroneous statement, gratuitously made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], that there is no foundation for. I stated that I wanted to get through the best bill I could. I have stated that when it gets to the Senate I do not intend to agree to anything that will not be satisfactory and does not promise to be permanent. It would be foolish to do anything else. I want to get the bill through the House in the best shape I can, and when it goes to the Senate and goes into conference I do not intend, if I am on that conference, that there shall be a bill agreed upon that will be so imperfect or unsatisfactory that people will seek to amend it at every session of Congress subsequently because they are not satisfied with the bill. I want progress, not a constant row; and when the wisdom of the House and of the Senate has perfected a bill in the conference committee that will be satisfactory to all concerned, then we shall have progress; and no matter how badly the gentlemen feel, or how mean they feel toward anybody, they are badly mistaken in making any such gratuitous charges about it.

I say I would like to hurry this bill through, because we have been at it for six weeks. I have no disposition to cut off the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS]. I have always shown him every courtesy and given hi mevery opportunity to offer amendments or engage in debate, and I ask that the debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I am not asking for unanimous consent. I moved to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire did move to strike out the last word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have one matter——

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DONOVAN. Who made the objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. DONOVAN. Did he rise to his feet?

The CHAIRMAN. He did.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum here.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, let us go on.

Mr. DONOVAN. No; I make the point of order that there is no quorum here, Mr. Chairman. If you are going to apply one rule, you want to apply them all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not object to a withdrawal.

Mr. MANN. I renew the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I will do so whenever the gentleman from Connecticut makes it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] renews the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present, counting the Chair—a quorum. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I believe my motion to strike out the last word was pending before this interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I think the chief objection against the amendments that have already been adopted to this bill is that no capital will go into these projects if the bill provides for compensation for a fixed term and limits the recapture of the property to the actual value of the property necessary to develop the franchise and not the value of the property that might use the power, and fixes the basis on which the Government would pay. This is a question of opinion, and I will admit that——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the suggestion to my friend from New Hampshire that all the questions stated by him have been passed upon by the committee; that we have accepted all of them; that we accede in good faith to all of them and expect to stand by them. Under those circumstances, I do not see any use to debate them again.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I said I wanted five minutes for the purpose of making some general remarks on this dam bill. That is the reason I asked for the five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I do not object.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I do not put my opinion, Mr. Chairman, as to what capital will do or will not do against the opinion of other gentlemen on the committee. I have my opinion. I believe that capital can be induced to develop these plants under a bill containing these amendments where there is a legitimate demand for a project and where they are not purely speculative; and in order to combat the opinion that it will not, I wish to present a few concrete facts. Several times during this debate reference has been made to the development of water power on the Connecticut River, which has been held up because Congress refused to take action. As a matter of fact, the company interested in that project—which was backed by the Stone-Webster people, one of the big water-power groups that know what they are about—accepted a bill which provided compensation to the Government for the franchise.

They accepted a bill which limited the recapture clause to the property actually used in the development and transmission of power, and to no other property, and one that limited very carefully the basis or value upon which the Government was to pay for that property. I wish to make as a part of the RECORD the Senate bill 8033 and the minority report on that bill, which contains a letter from the Secretary of War saying that this power company was willing to accept a bill with these provisions.

That bill is very similar to this bill, with the amendments that we have adopted, so that as a matter of fact we know that in one project, at least, capital was willing to go in under the terms that we think they ought to go in under. And, further than that, it appears in President Roosevelt's veto message of the James River power bill that the people back of the Rainy River project also stated in writing to the Secretary of War that they were willing to accept a bill which should provide for compensation to the Government for the franchise, and which should provide strict regulations about the termination of the charters.

So, as a matter of fact, there are practicable projects which capital will go into, even limited as this bill is limited. Mr. Chairman, I desire also to include in my remarks a report of the minority on water power of the National Conservation Association, including the resolution that was adopted by the convention; also an article published in the Christian Science Monitor of Boston, which contains a very careful comparison of the original Garrison bill, the committee bill, and the Ferris bill. I wish to have these made a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to include as a part of his remarks the documents he has stated. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What conservation report does the gentleman offer to print?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. The minority on water power of the National Conservation Association, held December 10, 1913, at Washington. It is a report signed by Henry L. Stimson, Joseph N. Teal, and Gifford Pinchot. It contains some very interesting facts—not theories, but some very interesting facts—about the development of water power and the concentration in the hands of a few people of the water power of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

NATIONAL CONSERVATION ASSOCIATION,
COLORADO BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1913.

The following statements show the recent progress made toward the conservation of the public water powers. They comprise the report of the minority of the water-power committee of the Fifth National Conservation Congress, signed by Henry L. Stimson, Joseph N. Teal, and Gifford Pinchot; the resolution of the congress on water power; and a statement of principles indorsed by the congress for the development of the water powers in public ownership:

REPORT OF THE MINORITY ON WATER POWER.

1. CONCENTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT.

The central fact in the water-power situation of to-day in concentration of control. Ten groups of power interests control 65 per cent of all the developed water power in the United States. Some of these groups are still further related through interlocking directors between the groups themselves. The reality of these groups is established by interlocking officers and directorates and by ownership of stock, which are the tests of relationship adopted and applied by the United States Bureau of Corporations.

But the rapid growth of concentration and control is even more striking than the amount of it. Two years ago the 10 greatest groups of water-power interests controlled, in round numbers, 3,270,000 horsepower developed and undeveloped. To-day the 10 greatest groups control 6,270,000 horsepower. Thus the amount of concentration has nearly doubled in two years.

The central need as to water power in the United States is development on terms fair both to the public and to the power interests. But the passage of water powers into private control may imply development or it may not. Has water-power control or water-power development been the chief object of the power interests? The following figures appear to answer the question:

The water powers which are held undeveloped by the 10 greatest groups are larger by about one-third than the developed water powers controlled by them. But still more striking is the increase in the last two years of controlled powers held undeveloped compared with developed water powers.

In 1911 the 10 greatest groups had developed and under construction 1,821,000 horsepower, and in 1913 they had 2,711,000, an increase of 890,000 horsepower. In 1911 the 10 greatest interests held undeveloped 1,450,000 horsepower, which had risen to 3,500,000 horsepower in 1913, an increase of 2,050,000 undeveloped horsepower.

These figures show that in the last two years the great power interests have increased their control of power held undeveloped more than twice as fast as they have increased their control of developed power.

The same preference of the water-power interests for concentrated control rather than for development may be shown in another way.

In 1908 the total developed water power in the United States was, in round numbers, 5,400,000 horsepower, and in 1913 it is 7,000,000, an increase of about 33 per cent for the five-year period. In 1908 the 13 greatest groups of interests controlled a total of 1,800,000 horsepower, developed and undeveloped, while in 1913 a smaller number, 10, of the greatest groups control a total of 6,300,000 horsepower, developed and undeveloped, an increase of 240 per cent. Thus concentration in ownership of water power in the United States has increased in the last five years about seven times faster than power development.

It must not be forgotten that the common operation of several water powers, by equalizing the load at different times, by reducing the danger of complete breakdown, and in other ways, has legitimate and real public advantages. If the concentration of control were intended merely to realize these advantages, there would be no such increase in the control of undeveloped powers as is actually taking place. Common operation of adjacent water powers has, however, very little relation, if any, to a monopolistic concentration of control such as the foregoing figures show is being brought about in the United States, and which, in the case of one group of interests, already extends into 17 States.

From the beginning of the fight to protect the public interest in the water powers the strenuous claim of the power interests has been that development was being or would be stifled, the growth of industry held back, and the public welfare injured by unreasonable requirements which discouraged investment and locked up against beneficial use the water powers on navigable streams, in the national forests, and on the public domain. So often and so plausibly has this claim been made that many good people have been brought to believe it, and the fight against the monopolization of water power has been made correspondingly harder.

But the foregoing figures, taken largely from the official statements of the power companies themselves, make the facts plain. As was said in the admirable report on water-power development made by the Commissioner of Corporations in March, 1912: "Our public policy must recognize both the need for utilization and the dangers of monopolistic control, and take effective action on both." We must check the unregulated concentration and monopoly of water powers, but that is not enough. The need is urgent also to force the development of water powers already under private control. This is as practicable as it is necessary. Prompt and ultimately complete development is required by the regulations for the use of power on the national forests adopted by the Forest Service, which was the first branch of the Federal Government to define and apply a water-power policy fair both to the power companies and to the American people.

Under the regulations of the Forest Service, which include also the very provisions so vigorously objected to by certain power interests as sure to hamper development, there were on the national forests on October 1, 1913, 78 water powers developed, 30 under construction, and no less than 76 of 728,300 horsepower capacity at low water, for which permits have been taken out within the past two years, under conditions requiring prompt development. The total capacity of all these powers is about 1,090,000 horsepower reckoned on minimum stream flow, or not less than twice that amount in actual fact. The total present development in the United States is about 7,000,000 horse. Nearly one-third as much has been or is required to be developed in the national forests under Government regulations. These figures finally and completely disprove the claim so often heard that proper Government regulations check development.

The record of the power situation makes it very clear that the fight for the conservation of the public water powers is first of all a fight against monopoly. But the second prime necessity in the public interest is to forbid and prevent the speculative holdings of powers unused, and to force the prompt and full development of the vast aggregate of power resources now held idle and unproductive under concentrated private control. If we take the valuation of $45 per horsepower, the water powers now held undeveloped in the control of the 10 great groups of interests represent a total annual loss to this country of $160,000,000 worth of power. To do the work which these powers would do were they developed costs the Nation each year, if we use the estimate of 10 tons of coal as necessary to produce one horsepower per year, more than 35,000,000 tons of our diminishing coal supply.

It is perfectly clear that no right to use a public water power should ever be granted unless the grantee can show either that he or it controls no water power not developed or not in actual process of development, or that there are reasons, sound from the point of view of the public, for leaving such controlled power undeveloped and asking for a further grant.

II. WATER-POWER POLICY.

Mechanical power lies at the root of modern civilization. The raw materials of mechanical power—coal, oil, natural gas, and falling water—are the bases for the larger part of transportation and industry. The control of them carries with it the control of industry and transportation, unless that control is modified by effective public regulation. Control of industry and transportation involves the control of modern life. Hence the monopoly of water power, one of the raw materials of mechanical power, is among the most threatening of monopolies. Upon this point the Inland Waterways Commission said in 1908:

"In the light of recent progress in electrical application it is clear that over wide areas the appropriation of water power offers an unequaled opportunity for monopolistic control of industries. Wherever water is now or will hereafter become the chief source of power the monopolization of electricity produced from running streams involves monopoly of power for the transportation of freight and passengers, for manufacturing and for supplying light, heat, and other domestic, agricultural, and municipal necessities to such an extent that unless regulated it will entail monopolistic control of the daily life of our people in an unprecedented degree. There is here presented an urgent need for prompt and vigorous action by State and Federal Governments."

In 1912 the final report of the National Waterways Commission said:

"The important fact to be gathered from the entire discussion of this phase of the subject would seem to be not so much that financiers and promoters might find it to their advantage to promote a monopoly as that economic considerations and the natural character of the business make monopoly almost inevitable and perhaps desirable when subject to strict public regulation. A form of possible monopoly, however, that needs to be immediately guarded against is the acquiring and holding of dam sites for speculative purposes where no immediate development is contemplated."

There are three essentials of a sound water-power policy:

1. Prompt development.
2. Prevention of unregulated monopoly.
3. Good service and fair charges to the consumer.

The regulation of service and charges is usually a State or local function. It should be exercised by the Nation only in interstate industry and when the failure of other agencies leaves the consumer at the mercy of a corporation.

The necessity for development need not be argued here. It has been from the first a most essential part of the conservation policy. To secure it the conditions of investment must be made safe and attractive to capital, and speculation in water power by holding power sites undeveloped must be stopped

A water power can be controlled and used by only one concern at one time. Therefore, water power is a natural monopoly. Hence the prevention of injury to the public from a monopolization of water power involves the whole question of the terms upon which the right to use a water-power site should be granted. It makes necessary a governmental veto power upon concentration of ownership, limitations of the term for which the franchise is granted, compensation to the public for value received, full publicity, and in general all those conditions in the permit or franchise which will help to safeguard the public against injustice or oppression, reduce or prevent the domination of one industry over another, and give to the development its greatest usefulness to the whole community. The public regulation of railroads and other public utilities whose franchises involve the use of natural monopolies offers an instructive analogy for similar regulation of water power.

The application of these principles is briefly considered under the following head:

III. FEDERAL WATER-POWER FRANCHISES.

Within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government are the water powers on navigable streams and those in the national forests and on the public domain, all of which may here be considered together. The prompt development and proper control of these powers constitute the two great phases of the national water-power problem.

The recent Supreme Court decision in the Chandler-Dunbar case has confirmed the right of Federal control over the water powers of navigable streams, and thus has overthrown one of the principal legal contentions heretofore used to obstruct the legislation required both in the interest of the power companies and of the public. That decision contains in substance the following conclusions:

(1) In the regulation of navigation—and to regulate means to develop—the United States is a single Government, and as to that governmental function there are no States.

(2) Where, when, and how such improvements in navigation are to be made is a legislative question for congressional determination.

(3) Such improvement may be furthered by the utilization of the power inherent in navigable streams to the extent of making commercial use of such power over and above the needs of navigation.

(4) This power belongs to all the people and not to the chance owner of the contiguous land.

The right of the Federal Government to control and dispose of water powers on the national forests and the public domain has never been successfully questioned.

Federal legislation to insure prompt development and the prevention of unregulated monopoly of water power and to make good franchises possible is urgently needed, both for the navigable streams and for the national forests and public domain. The essential provisions of a franchise fair to both sides are the same in both cases.

In order to protect the public interest and promote power development, rights to develop and use water power should be granted in accordance with the following general conditions, among others. These conditions are the result of governmental experience and of much discussion with water-power men and others.

Franchises should be granted:

(a) So that during a period of not exceeding 30 years the franchise or privilege granted by the Government may be revoked at any time by the granting officer for sufficient cause, subject to review by the courts. Although almost without exception the whole development of water power under Government franchise has so far taken place under revocable permits, these revocable permits are not fair to the power interests, whose investment should be protected for the whole of the fixed period of the grant. In this way security and attractiveness of investment will be obtained without the obvious dangers of perpetual control.

(b) Thereafter the franchise or privilege may be revoked at any time in the absolute discretion of the granting officer upon giving one year's notice, and upon payment to the grantee of the value of its material property and improvements as hereafter provided in (j). The power to terminate the franchise and take over the plant will greatly strengthen the efficiency of public control.

(c) After the expiration of the first period of the grant (described under (a) above as "not exceeding 30 years") and at recurring periods of not more than 10 years thereafter, the amount of compensation to be paid to the Government for the grant, and all other terms and conditions of the grant during the next succeeding period of not more than 10 years, shall automatically come up for readjustment and determination by the granting officer of the Government. Thus as conditions change the compensation to the public and the terms of the franchise may be changed to meet them.

(d) At the end of a period of 50 years from the granting of the franchise it shall automatically determinate, but may be renewed by mutual agreement and on terms to be fixed by the Government. In this way the conditions of the franchise will necessarily become subject to complete review under circumstances most conducive to the public advantage. At the same time the provisions for renewal to the original grantee upon mutual agreement will be attractive to capital and will tend to promote development.

(e) Franchises should be nonassignable and nontransferable except with the approval of the Government, because thereby speculation in power rights and monopoly of power control may be regulated or prevented.

(f) On condition of a reasonable annual charge based on the value of the site for power development, and adjustable at intervals, and upon the further condition of direct Government participation in the profits over and above a percentage to be determined in the franchise.

The values which are made available by water-power franchises should pay a yearly and unfailing compensation in return. The public makes the grant and there should be no uncertainty as to the participation of the public in the profits which arise from the grant. The power interests should pay something for what they get and what they pay should be subject to readjustment in accordance with the changing value of what the public has given them. The difficulties inherent in the establishment of new enterprises in sparsely settled regions should be recognized.

In the case of powers upon navigable streams, it is appropriate that the proceeds should be used for the improvements of navigation. The price of hydroelectric power to the consumer is determined not by the cost of production but by what the traffic will bear, and the latter is fixed by the cost of competitive steam power. The public therefore can not get its full share of the advantage of power development except by a Government charge, collected, so to speak, at the water wheel, as set forth fully and conclusively in the reports of the Commissioner of Corporations. For the same reason this charge will not be paid by the consumer but out of the profits of the corporation.

(g) On condition of development of the whole capacity of the power site as rapidly as the granting officer may from time to time require, giving due consideration to market conditions and demands, and of continuous operation, subject also to market conditions, in order to prevent waste of power before and after development.

(h) With the right of the public to approve or disapprove issues of capital stock in order to prevent overcapitalization, to prescribe uniform methods of accounting, and to inspect all books and records of the grantee, for only so can public officials and the public learn the facts.

(i) With the right reserved to the Government to regulate rates and service to the consumer, should the business be or become interstate or should the State or local authority fail to do so.

(j) On condition that the public may, after a fixed period, take over the works covered by the franchise at their appraisal physical value at the time, not including consequential damages or the value of the franchise. While all Government water-power franchises now granted provide for termination of the franchise from the beginning at the will of the Government without compensation, that provision is an unfair burden upon the grantee, tends to increase the cost to the consumer, and should be removed.

(k) On condition that the franchise may be terminated if at any time the works constructed under it are owned, controlled, or operated by an unlawful trust, or in restraint of trade.

The general dam act (June 23, 1910), under which all franchises on navigable streams are or should be granted, does not, as interpreted, require adequate compensation to the Federal Government for the use of water power, does not provide for the renewal of franchises or for taking over the improvements at the discretion of the Government at the end of 50 years, and neither prohibits speculation in franchises nor requires prompt and complete development. It should be amended in accordance with the foregoing.

While the effort to secure the passage of sound and needed water-power legislation has not yet succeeded, the passage of bad legislation has become increasingly difficult. This statement is true in spite of the fact that the indefensible Coosa River bill passed both House and Senate at the end of the last administration, and was only prevented from becoming a law by the wise and patriotic veto of the President. The recent introduction in Congress of water-power bills by Senator BURTON and by Mr. LEVER, of South Carolina, both of which bills clearly recognize that the public interest in water power should come first, is a further satisfactory evidence of progress in the right direction.

RESOLUTION ON WATER POWER.

On November 20 Mr. Gifford Pinchot introduced the following amendment to the resolutions of the National Conservation Congress. This amendment, which strongly indorses the leading conclusions and principles laid down in the above report of the minority on water power, was passed by an overwhelming vote:

"Whereas concentrated monopolistic control of water power in private hands is swiftly increasing in the United States, and far more rapidly than public control thereof; and

"Whereas this concentrating, if it is fostered, as in the past, by outright grants of public powers in perpetuity, will inevitably result in a highly monopolistic control of mechanical power, one of the bases of modern civilization, and a prime factor in the cost of living; Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we recognize the firm and effective control of water-power corporations as a pressing and immediate necessity urgently required in the public interest;

"That we recognize that there is no restraint so complete, effective, and permanent as that which comes from firmly retained ownership of the power site;

"That it is, therefore, the solemn judgment of the Fifth National Conservation Congress that hereafter no water power now owned or controlled by the public should be sold, granted, or given away in perpetuity, or in any manner removed from the public ownership, which alone can give sound basis of assured and permanent control in the interests of the people."

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

The congress not only recognized the need for the regulation of water-power monopoly by the passage of the above amendment, but also by its indorsement of the following statement of principles recommended by its water-power committee laid down the main lines of working principles for the development of our public water powers:

The committee on water power, while finding a difference of opinion among its members as to certain details of the subject, feels very strongly the importance of making clear the general principles which control it, and realizes keenly the consequences which would follow a failure to agree upon a constructive program of progress. It has therefore framed the following brief statement of the recommendations upon which it is unanimous:

A grant of the right to use a water power, while differing in some details, is essentially similar to a grant of any other privilege or franchise from the Government, State or National, and its terms, regulation, and control should be guided by essentially the same principles necessary to safeguard the rights of the public and of posterity as have been found essential in the case of other classes of franchises from the Government. Particularly is this true in view of the fact that a water power, being perpetual, will surely tend to increase in value as other sources of power, such as coal and oil, become exhausted. At the same time, for the very purpose of preserving our other power resources which are capable of exhaustion, the development of water power, under proper safeguards of the public interest, should be earnestly encouraged and hastened. We recommend that the following principles should govern the granting of a privilege to use a water power:

(a) For a definite period, sufficient to be financially attractive to investors, the privilege should be irrevocable except for cause, reviewable by the courts.

(b) Thereafter the privilege should continue subject to revocation in the absolute discretion of the Government, exercised through its administrative board or officer, upon giving reasonable notice and upon payment of the value of the physical property and improvements of the grantee as below provided under (h).

(c) After the expiration of the period provided for in (a) above, at recurring intervals of not more than 10 years, the amount of compensation to be paid to the Government for the privilege and all the terms and conditions of the grant during the next succeeding period of not more than 10 years shall automatically come up for determination by the granting officer of the Government.

(d) The privilege shall be unassignable except with the approval of the Government in order to safeguard the interests of the Government against speculation in water powers and against appropriation without prompt development.

(e) The privilege shall be granted only on condition of development of the whole capacity of the power site as rapidly as the granting officer may from time to time require, giving due consideration to reasonable market demands and conditions, and also on condition of continuous operation, subject to such demands and conditions.

(f) The right to receive compensation for the value of the privilege, varying according to the proper conditions of each case, shall be reserved to the Government, State or Federal, from whom the privilege comes. We believe that the reservation of such a right to compensation is a vital essential toward the end of proper regulation. It is not sufficient to trust that the public will always receive its proper share by means of regulation of rates alone. Local authorities may neglect or may be unable, under conflict of jurisdiction, or for other reasons, to exact in the interest of the public the full value of the public's right. The value of a water power may in the course of time increase far beyond the power of local regulation to adequately distribute its benefits. At the same time the method of enacting compensation must be carefully safeguarded so that in case full compensation by rate regulation is exacted by local authorities an additional burden shall not be imposed. We believe that in normal cases the best method is for the Government to share increasingly in the net profits of the enterprise, provided those profits exceed a certain reasonable percentage, the right of the Government being recognized otherwise merely by the imposition of a small annual fee or its equivalent.

(g) The Government shall have the right to prescribe uniform methods of accounting for the grantee and to inspect its books and records.

(h) Upon revocation of a privilege by the Government the grantee shall be paid a compensation equivalent to the fair valuation of its property, exclusive of franchise and consequential damages; this compensation shall include such appurtenances as are necessary for the operation of the water power and the transmission of electricity therefrom, but shall not include such properties as railroads, lighting systems, factories, etc., which are of themselves separate industries.

In such transfer all contracts for the sale or delivery of power made in good faith previous to such notice of transfer should be assumed by the transferee so that the said grantee may operate and maintain the power business during his occupancy of the property under such stable guarantees as may beget confidence therein by prospective long-term contractors, provided that the Government or said transferee shall not assume any contracts made at a price or under conditions which shall be determined by the proper administrative officer of the Government to be unreasonable or confiscatory.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., Wednesday, May 6, 1914.]

CONSERVATION LAWS ARE NEAR—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING LEGISLATION ON THIS SUBJECT AT THIS SESSION BRIGHTENED BY ONE MEASURE HOUSE MAY CONSIDER—COMPARISONS MADE—VIEWS OF DIFFERENT FACTIONS ARE SET FORTH AND QUESTION OF STATE AND FEDERAL RIGHTS IS INVOLVED IN DISCUSSION.

WASHINGTON.

Possibility of obtaining some conservation legislation at this session of Congress brightened a bit when on Friday last, on the request of Majority Leader UNDERWOOD, concurred in by Chairman ADAMSON, of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the House made the Adamson water-power bill the continuing order of business. This means that this bill, which is an amendment to the general dam act, may be brought up at any time when the House is not occupied in consideration of appropriation bills, except on Calendar Wednesdays, District of Columbia Mondays, or pension Fridays.

"This bill is of very great importance," said Mr. UNDERWOOD in asking for the privilege. "It is impracticable to build dams across navigable streams under the present dam act, because we can not pass a bill to conform to it in Congress. Within the last three years, I think, three dams have been built across navigable waters and a very large number of dams built across waters that are not navigable. I think this is a good bill and should be considered by the House." Chairman ADAMSON said he thought one full day of debate would be sufficient on the bill.

REPORTS BEING PREPARED.

Minority reports from the Interstate Commerce Committee are being prepared on this bill. Representative RAYMOND B. STEVENS, of New Hampshire, a Democrat, and Representative A. W. LAFFERTY, of Oregon, Progressive, will submit dissenting views, and a Republican minority report is expected. The main objection to the bill is that it does not sufficiently assert Federal rights in navigable streams.

The water-power bill may get before the House in a few days, as soon as the naval appropriation bill which is now pending is passed, if by that time no other appropriation bill is ready for consideration. But there are four others—pensions, diplomatic and consular, general deficiency, and sundry civil—yet to come, and if they are all ready in order it may be weeks before water power gets a hearing.

PREPARATION IN SENATE.

In the Senate a subcommittee of the Commerce Committee, presided over by Senator BANKHEAD, of Alabama, is preparing a water-power bill for navigable rivers, and it is planned to have it introduced in time for consideration at this session. This bill will contain many provisions similar to those of the Adamson bill, but will not be entirely the same.

The other great branch of water-power conservation is being considered in the House Committee on Public Lands, where hearings are now in progress on the Ferris bill, governing leasing of water-power sites on forest reserves and other Government lands. Former Secretary of the Interior Walter L. Fisher and Gifford Pinchot, former Chief Forester and now president of the National Conservation Association, have both testified generally in support of the Ferris bill, which was prepared by Representative SCOTT FERRIS, of Oklahoma, chairman of the committee, in conjunction with Secretary of the Interior Lane.

COMPARISON OF BILLS.

The Adamson bill, which deals with navigable rivers only, and the Ferris bill, which deals with nonnavigable streams on public lands, are related in interest only in their comparative conformity to the administration's general policy of water-power conservation. While the details must be essentially different, the broad policy of Federal and State rights, as expressed in the plan of charges for water and regulation of rates and service, must apply in general alike in both bills. Otherwise the War Department, governing navigable streams, would be proceeding upon a different basis from that of the Interior Department.

Four principal factions are working, in harmony on some points and in opposition on others, for the development of a conservation program. Secretary Lane's policy is contained in the Ferris bill; Secretary of War Garrison submitted his policy in a bill recommended to the House Interstate Commerce Committee; the House committee has adopted some of Secretary Garrison's provisions, but the Adamson bill is far from being the Garrison bill; the fourth faction consists of the Pinchot conservationists, who are strongest in their insistence upon Federal supremacy. It is impossible to tell just how the minority members of the House committee stand until their reports are made, but one of them, at least, conforms in general to the conservationists' platform.

POINTS AGREED UPON.

But while some fundamental points of disagreement remain, much progress has been made until all factions are generally agreed upon many more points. Briefly, the points of agreement are:

1. Definite term of lease of 50 years, with renewals for fixed periods at discretion of the United States
2. Requirement for reasonably prompt and orderly development to supply demand for power and continuous operation.
3. Federal regulation of rates and service on interstate business.
4. Prohibition of restraint of trade by combinations.
5. Prohibition of assignment or transfer of franchises without Government permission to prevent speculation.
6. Provision that the United States may take over the plant at expiration of term of lease by paying actual value for physical property and assuming contracts made in good faith, good will and franchise not to be valued.
7. Provision for lease of surplus power developed by Government plants or dams.
8. Navigation shall be paramount consideration on navigable streams.
9. Water shall be used for most valuable purpose.
10. Limited fine specified for violations of requirements.

The chief points in disagreement are:

1. Charge for use of power.
2. Disposition of revenue.
3. Regulation of rates and service on intrastate business.
4. Requirement that the grantee shall be a public utility.

WHAT BILLS PROVIDE.

The Lane-Ferris public lands water-power bill is almost entirely satisfactory to the Pinchot conservationists, indicating that when it gets before the House it will be passed or defeated strictly as a conservation bill. The Adamson bill is less fortunate in that it does not conform either to the policy of Secretary Garrison or that of the conservationists, being between the two. The Garrison bill as recommended to the Interstate Commerce Committee is a State rights bill, while the conservationists favor strong Federal authority. The Adamson bill retains some of the Garrison State rights features and adopts some of the conservationists' Federal rights claims.

In brief the Adamson bill provides:

1. Construction of locks may be required to protect navigation.
2. The water resources must be utilized to best advantage.
3. The Federal Government may charge the grantee for the benefit derived from reservoirs and other headwater improvements, to the maximum annual amount of 5 per cent of total Government investment, plus maintenance of said improvements. (No charge is made for use of water, which is most serious objection of conservationists.)
4. Government may charge 5 per cent per year for use by grantee of any public lands.
5. Navigation is paramount consideration.
6. Limit of $1,000 for each offense placed for violation of requirements.
7. Assignment or transfer of franchises without approval of proper Government authority prohibited to prevent speculation in franchises.
8. Franchise term of 50 years, or until compensation is made if Government decides to take over plant. After that term Government may terminate franchise on one year's notice, paying fair value for property, not including good will or value of franchise.
9. If plant is taken over by Government or transferred to another grantee, pending contracts made in good faith must be assumed.
10. Reasonable rates and service, without discrimination.
11. United States, through Secretary of War, to regulate rates and service on interstate business, and on intrastate business if State neglects to do so adequately in opinion of Secretary of War.
12. Prompt construction—commencement within one year and completion within three years to meet community's demands, unless time is extended by Secretary of War.
13. Surplus power developed by Government plant may be leased.
14. Prohibition against ownership by trusts in restraint of trade, but recognition of natural monopoly and permission for interchange of power with other companies.

GARRISON VIEWS GIVEN.

The bill submitted to the Interstate Commerce Committee by Secretary of War Garrison, as a basis for amendment of the general dam act applicable to navigable rivers, provided, in substance, as follows:

1. Congress to grant authority to construct dams, permits to be issued by the Secretary of War and Chief of Army Engineers.
2. No permit to be granted until State in which power plant is to be located has authorized grantee to become a public utility and has provided adequate laws and instrumentalities for proper regulation.
3. State may tax the power company.
4. Secretary of War to regulate interstate business.
5. Government may require grantee to construct navigation locks and to operate them without cost to the Government.
6. Project must provide for largest use of the water resources.
7. The Government may charge grantee reasonable amount annually for the benefits derived from storage reservoirs, watersheds, and other headwater improvements.
8. United States to be reimbursed for any expense incurred in supervising project.
9. Grantee must pay for restoring impaired navigation.
10. Navigation shall be regarded paramount consideration, the Government to control level of water, etc.
11. Five thousand dollars fine for violation of terms of grant, each month's delay to be regarded as new violation.
12. Term of franchise, 50 years; renewals, 5 years.
13. United States may take over plant at end of term by paying fair value, not including good-will or franchise value, and by assuming good-faith contracts.
14. Assignment or transfer of franchises without approval of Government forbidden.
15. Ownership by trust in restraint of trade, and exaction of unreasonable rates prohibited.
16. United States may lease surplus power developed at any Government plant.

PINCHOT CLAIMS URGED.

The Pinchot conservationists advocate as an ideal general dam act for navigable streams the following provisions:

1. A 50-year franchise, revocable only for good cause before expiration of term; revocable thereafter upon one year's notice and payment of appraised value of material property and improvements; renewal terms, 10 years; franchise to terminate automatically in 50 years, but renewable on new terms to be prescribed by Government.
2. Franchise nonassignable, except with Government approval, to prevent speculation in franchises.
3. Annual charge for use of water and any Government land used and, in addition, participation by Government in any profits realized above a certain per cent; proceeds devoted to navigation improvement.
4. Development of project to capacity as required by granting officers to supply needs of consumers.
5. Public censorship of capitalization.
6. Government regulation of interstate business and of intrastate business if State fails to regulate satisfactorily.
7. Ownership by trust in restraint of trade penalized by forfeiture of franchise.

The conservationists point out the principal defects of the present general dam act in its failure to (1) require compensation for use of water power; (2) provide for franchise renewals; (3) provide for Government taking over plant in 50 years; (4) prohibit speculation in franchises; (5) require prompt and complete development.

WATER-POWER LEASES.

The Lane-Ferris bill regulating water-power leases on public lands and nonnavigable streams, including some provisions of general water-power policy, provides, in brief, as follows:

1. Secretary of Interior empowered to lease public lands on regulations established by himself for water-power development.
2. Term of franchise, 50 years.
3. Franchise must have approval of the chief officer of the department under whose supervision the particular land in question falls (national forests, military, or other reservations).
4. Projects serving municipal purposes to have preference.
5. Reasonable development and continuous operation required.
6. No one consumer to receive more than 50 per cent of plant's output without consent of Secretary of the Interior.
7. Secretary of Interior to regulate interstate business.
8. Restraint of trade and ownership by trusts prohibited.
9. Assignment or transfer of franchises without approval of Government officer prohibited.
10. After 50 years, on 3 years' notice, United States may take over property, paying cost of rights of way, etc., and reasonable value of property, good will and value of franchise not considered. In lieu of taking plant over Government may lease to another party or renew original lease.
11. Secretary of Interior may authorize making of contracts extending beyond duration of franchise. In case the United States takes over plant or leases to another party at termination, these contracts must be assumed.
12 Government may charge for power, proceeds to be used first to pay cost of administration, balance to be paid half to Federal Reclamation fund and half to State for education and public improvements.
13. No franchises to be issued except for projects in States that provide adequate laws and instrumentalities for regulation.
14. Land entries on water-power lands permitted, subject to water-power development.
15. Secretary of Interior may require statements of cost, etc., of grantees.

FIXED TERM OF LEASE.

The provision for a fixed term of lease of 50 years is for the purpose of putting a stop to perpetual franchises. The conservation campaign of the past few years has aroused all factions to the necessity of reserving in perpetuity to the Federal Government all the great water-power resources. Requirement for prompt and orderly development is to insure utilization of the water resources for the consumers' benefit. This provision, with the one prohibiting assignment or transfer of franchises without Government approval, is designed to prevent trafficking and speculating in franchises by promoters who have no intention of actually developing the power themselves.

Prohibition against ownership of power plants by trusts operating in restraint of trade is made with the acknowledgment that the water-power business must of necessity be a monopoly, at least, to a great extent. With this in view the matter of regulation has been regarded as most important. There is no conflict over the Federal regulation of interstate business, but the State rights adherents maintain that under no circumstances should the Federal Government regulate interstate rates, whether the States perform this function efficiently or not. The conservationists and others who favor retention of a firm hold on the water powers by the Federal Government, think the Government should regulate intrastate business as well as interstate if the States neglect to do it properly. The Adamson bill leans far to the Federal extreme on this point, lodging in the Secretary of War the authority to say whether or not the State is regulating as it should. "Any State may control the subject if it will only do its duty," said Chairman Adamson. "If it fails to regulate, the Secretary of War will."

SUBJECT OF COMPENSATION.

Closely akin to the matter of regulation is the matter of compensation to the Government, for both affect rates. The State rights argument is that the power really belongs to the people, and the Federal Government has no right to receive compensation for use of the water. Further, they urge, such a charge is an indirect tax upon consumers, as it must add to the rates for power. The federalists, on the other hand, argue that the water in navigable streams belongs to the Government as trustee for the people and that compensation should be paid for its use. Answering the economic argument, they say that the rates for service are based on what the traffic will bear, as there is no competition. Electricity developed by water power costs, roughly speaking, on an average 4 cents per kilowatt, while steam-generated electricity costs from 8 to 10 cents. Steam power, at the present time, at least, is the basis for rate making. Unless regulation is most efficient, then, it is argued, the charge imposed by the Government would come out of profits and not be added onto consumers' rates. It is regarded as best policy to leave as little as possible to be done by regulation.

STATE RIGHTS ASSERTED.

The Adamson bill and the Garrison bill have taken the State rights side of this question, permitting the Government to charge only for the benefit derived by the power company from headwater improvements, forest reserves, etc., which increase the flow of water, and not providing for a charge upon use of the water. Besides objecting to this elimination, the conservationists point to this charge for headwater improvements as impracticable because of the difficulty in estimating and valuing the benefits so derived, and apportioning them among the users of the water all along the stream.

Explaining their attitude on this point, the committee says: "We have not provided for any specific tax upon the business of the enterprise. If the Federal Government should conclude that it is necessary to take away from the States the matter of water power as an object of taxation, we consider that a proper and safe way to do that is for the Ways and Means Committee to report a bill for levying a uniform excise tax upon all water power, or hydroelectric, or upon water-power sites developed or undeveloped.

INTERESTS TO BE CONSIDERED.

Secretary Garrison said on this point: "Legally speaking, I do not think there can be any dispute that with respect to the question of power the position of the Federal Government is paramount. Nothing can be done without its consent, and only that can be done to which it consents. The interests to be considered I view as follows: First, there are the communities which will benefit by utilization of the water power. Next is the immediate sovereign over them which would direct this matter and have power with respect thereto, were it not for the paramount power above alluded to, which resides in the Federal Government. Finally, there is the Federal Government with absolute power, by reason of its ability to prevent the doing of anything without its consent. I conceive the equitable sphere of the Government to be to see to its that this great public utility shall be availed of in a way that will benefit the greatest number possible under the most favorable terms possible, and to recognize the justice—not as a matter of law—of the State entity receiving a revenue from the operation of this public utility within its confines and regulating it for the benefit of its people.

PAYMENT IS A QUESTION.

"The State may make proper provisions for taxation or receipt of revenue. It might properly provide a scheme which, in consideration of no imposts, or of slight imposts, the dam and accessory works should, at the end of a fixed period, become the property of the State. In other words, the State might say: 'Instead of getting a revenue out of you during the life of this franchise, we will abstain from so doing and take our payment in a lump sum, namely, the improvement, which shall thereupon become ours.' By so doing the State would substitute itself for the previous grantee and be identicaly situated with respect to the Federal Government."

The conservationists say: "The values made available by water-power franchises should pay a yearly and unfailing compensation in return. The public makes the grant and there should be no uncertainty as to the participation of the public in the profits which arise from the grant. The public can not get its full share of the advantage of power development except by a Government charge, collected, so to speak, at the water wheel, as set forth in the reports of the Commissioner of Corporations. It is not sufficient to trust that the public will always receive its proper share by means of regulation of rates alone. Local authorities may neglect or may be unable, under conflict of jurisdiction, or for other reasons, to exact in the public's interest the full value of the public's right. The value of a water power may in the course of time increase far beyond the power of local regulation to adequately distribute its benefits. We believe in normal cases the best method is for the Government to share increasingly in the net profits of the enterprise, provided those profits exceed a reasonable percentage, the right of the Government being recognized otherwise merely by the imposition of a small annual fee or its equivalent."

Disposition of revenue is a question closely allied to compensation, but it is regarded as not so vital in importance. This may be changed from time to time to meet changing conditions and demands without sacrificing a principle, but decision of right to exact revenue involves a principle which must stand permanently.

[Senate Report No. 1131, Sixty-second Congress, third session.]

CONSTRUCTION OF A DAM AND LOCK IN THE CONNECTICUT RIVER.

Mr. BURTON, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 8033:

The majority of the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut, report the same to the Senate without amendment, and recommend that the same do pass.

This bill provides a means by which, without expense to the Federal Government, a very important section of the Connecticut River between the towns of Hartford, Conn., and Springfield and Holyoke, Mass., may be improved for purposes of navigation. This reach of the stream contains a heavy fall known as the Enfield Rapids, which constitute a serious obstacle to its navigability. At present the practical navigation of the stream for commercial purposes ceases at the city of Hartford. Above this point the river is navigable only for boats of slight draft and small capacity. Somewhat more than 80 years ago the State of Connecticut chartered the Connecticut River Co., which is the grantee under this bill, as a navigation company, and for the purposes of affording navigation around these rapids the said company constructed a canal and lock, which it still operates. Originally the revenues of the company were derived from tolls imposed upon boats using this canal. At a later date the water power created by their dam was commercially utilized and the company thereafter derived its revenues from this source and voluntarily abolished the tolls. Subsequently the State of Connecticut amended the charter of the navigation company, granting it the right to generate, use, and sell hydroelectric power.

The conditions in this stream are typical of a large class of river improvements which the Federal Government is called upon to make. The large expenditures already required to improve rivers more naturally suited to purposes of navigation usually preclude the possibility of attempting to improve streams of comparatively small flow, or where obstructed with difficult rapids, unless a large portion of the expense can be derived from the stream itself by utilizing the value of the water-power possibilities. In principle it would appear to be eminently just that revenues for improving streams of this class should be derived from the privilege granted and not assessed against taxpayers in general. It would also seem exceedingly desirable that the maximum beneficial use of streams, both for navigation and water power, should be secured in the interest of the fullest conservation of our natural resources. Evidently the improvement of certain streams can best be accomplished where these two purposes are coordinated and carried on together.

In the present instance this bill grants to the Connecticut River Co. the right to construct a dam at a point in the Connecticut River below a line crossing both channels of the river and Kings Island midway between its northerly and southerly end. The act provides that the dam shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the general dam act approved June 23, 1910, with certain modifications, which will be noted in the subsequent portion of this report.

According to the provisions of the bill a lock must be constructed in connection with the dam of such size and design as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may require. The plan, if carried out, will thus provide slack-water navigation between Hartford and Holyoke adequate to meet the present and prospective commerce of this reach of the stream. The dam will also develop the full power possibilities of this portion of the river.

It appears to be a settled question that the Federal Government may impose a charge for the use of the surplus water, not needed for purposes of navigation, which may be made available incidentally to the construction of a dam by the Federal Government for purposes of navigation. It would seem equally evident that the Federal Government also has the right to utilize a private agency for the construction of dams in aid of navigation, granting the use of the incidental water power thereby created to the constructing company in compensation, and requiring such return as the circumstances may warrant.

The bill presented marks the most distinct step yet taken toward this method for the improvement of navigation in combination with hydroelectric development under the control and supervision of the Federal Government, but without Federal expenditure. In addition to the requirement that the company shall construct the dam, lock, and all works appurtenant thereto, without expense to the Federal Government, it is also provided that the Secretary of War, as a part of the conditions and stipulations referred to in the general dam act, may in his discretion impose a reasonable annual charge or return to be paid by the said corporation or its assigns to the United States, the proceeds thereof to be used for the further development of navigation in the Connecticut River and water connected therewith. It is provided, however, that no charge shall be imposed which shall be such as to deprive the said corporation of a reasonable return upon its actual and necessary investment.

The public interests seem to be fully safeguarded in this instance against exorbitant charges, because the generation and sale of electricity in the territory covered by this development are under the jurisdiction, both in Connecticut and Massachusetts, of well-organized utility commissions under State authority. It is believed that the authority of the Secretary of War to require a return to the Government in case the corporation earns more than a reasonable return upon its bona fide investment will be, in effect, a regulation of the charges of the company as well as a source of revenue to the Government, because it will be one of the most important factors to be taken into consideration by the commissions mentioned in fixing the rates of service which the company may charge. The provision, therefore, complies with the recommendation of the National Waterways Commission in its final report (p. 61), which reads as follows:

"Charges and regulation: That a grant for water-power development constitutes a special privilege, for which the Government is entitled to proper compensation, is a principle which should be clearly established. The actual value of such privilege will, of course, vary greatly under different conditions. Every grant of the Government should, however, be dependent on the payment of such reasonable charges as may be determined by the circumstances and equities involved in each case. The commission does not suggest or advise that this right or power of Congress should be invoked as a means of raising revenue for general purposes, but only to reimburse the Government for the cost of surveys, inspection, and similar expenses, and for the purpose of controlling the use of streams in the interest of the public."

The most important departures from the provisions of the general dam act as approved June 23, 1910, are as follows:

In the first section it is provided that the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, for adequate reasons, extend the period for the completion of the dam two years beyond the prescribed limits of the general dam act. The extension of time contemplated appeared to the committee reasonable, considering the difficulty of construction likely to be encountered.

In the same section it is provided that the rights and privileges granted under the act may not be assigned except upon the written authorization of the Secretary of War, except in pursuance of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction. This provision was inserted with the intention of preventing its assignment for the purpose of creating monopolistic combination, a danger which should be carefully guarded against.

Section 2 contains numerous provisions intended to insure the primary operation of the dam and lock in the interests of navigation, while section 3 provides for the construction of a lock, in accordance with plans to be approved by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, coincidently with the construction of a dam, and contains the provision of the general dam act requiring the company to convey the completed lock and appurtenances to the United States free of cost, together with such land as may be required for approaches and for the maintenance thereof, and to furnish the United States free of cost power for operating and lighting such lock and property.

Section 5 contains a provision materially different from those of former grants of this character. It is provided that at the expiration of the 50-year period contemplated by the general dam act the original grant may be renewed, transferred to other parties, or withheld. In the event that the grant is transferred to other parties, the Government shall require as a condition of the transfer of the property that the new grantee shall compensate the original grantee for the property acquired at a reasonable valuation. In the event that the United States refuses to renew the grant it shall itself make such compensation.

This provision is based upon the theory that if the Federal Government restricts its grantee to reasonable earnings, which appears to be a policy necessary to enforce in the interests of the public, it shall also provide, as far as may be expedient, for the security of the necessary bona fide investment. The effect of this stipulation will be to cure, in its application to this grant, an undoubted defect of the general dam act and to make this system of legislation conform to the well-known methods obtaining in the case of long leases of land, providing for an appraisal and purchase of improvements at the expiration of the lease.

The majority of the committee feel that the provisions contained in this bill are exceedingly desirable, both in the interests of an enlarged improvement of a certain class of streams and also for the utilization of our water powers under provisions which will safeguard fully the public interests, and therefore earnestly recommend the passage of this bill.

Attached hereto will be found copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, which indicates that he is fully in accord with the provisions of the bill.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 2, 1913.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to respond to the kind request of your committee for an expression of my views as to—

"A bill for the improvement of navigation of the Connecticut River and authorizing the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam in said river above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut."

It is understood that this bill is intended to replace three bills of a similar import, as to which I reported to your committee under date of April 18 last.

As reported to me by the Chief of Engineers, the Connecticut River between Hartford, Conn., and Holyoke, Mass., calls for improvements in the interest of navigation which are delayed owing to the very large cost of such improvements if independently undertaken by the Government. If, however, the improvement of navigation could be combined with a project for water-power development, whereby the cost of the improvement demanded by the interest of navigation would not devolve upon the Government, the adoption of such a plan would be plainly in the public interest. The bill now under consideration seeks thus to combine the commercial interests of navigation with the interests of water-power development and, it is believed, provides the most economical method of securing the improvement of the river sufficient for the present and prospective commerce. From the reports submitted to Congress, in accordance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909 (H. Doc. No. 818, 61st Cong., 3d sess.), it appears that the lock necessary for navigation purposes alone was estimated to cost $430,000; and inasmuch as this estimate was made several years ago it is probable that the cost to-day will be considerably larger. In addition to this, if the improvement of the Enfield Rapids were to be undertaken by the Federal Government directly, the necessity for purchasing flowage rights and extinguishing vested interests acquired under State law would add considerably to the actual cost of the work, and would doubtless present legal complications that would greatly embarrass the consummation of the improvement.

Therefore, from the standpoint of navigation, I am of the opinion that the project embraced in the bill whereby the lock and dam are built by the grantee as an agency of the Federal Government is very advantageous to the United States. On the other hand, the bill will give to the Connecticut River Co. very valuable water-power rights in connection with this work of improvement. The case thus falls within the principles which the President has laid down in his veto message of August 24, 1912, on the Coosa River dam bill (S. 7343, 62d Cong., 2d sess.) and calls for a reassertion of the views I have heretofore expressed on bills of similar import, as to which I have previously reported to your committee. In other words, I think the bill should not become law unless a provision is added giving the Secretary of War authority, as one of the conditions of the privilege granted by the act, to require the grantee to pay to the United States a reasonable annual return after making due allowance for construction, renewals, depreciation charges, and a reasonable return to the grantee on his bona fide investment, such proceeds to be devoted to the interests of navigation. With such a provision, I am of the opinion that the bill is in the interests of the public, and I strongly urge enactment.

After conference with the representatives of the Connecticut River Co., they have consented to the insertion in the bill of an amendment to meet my views as to the provision for compensation which I deem vital to its enactment. It is contained in the last proviso of section 1 of the inclosed draft of the bill. I have also examined the remainder of the annexed draft, containing certain minor amendments proposed by the Connecticut River Co., and believe that the interests of the Government, from the standpoint of my department, are adequately safeguarded thereby.

Very respectfully,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Chairman of Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

A bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut.

Be it enacted, etc., That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the Connecticut River Co., a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the State of Connecticut, to relocate its "Enfield Dam," so called, and to construct, maintain, and operate such relocated dam (which, if located opposite Kings Island, in said river, shall extend across both branches of the river), together with works appurtenant and necessary thereto, across the Connecticut River at any point below a line crossing both branches of the river and Kings Island midway between the northerly and southerly ends of said Island: Provided, That, except as may be otherwise specified in this act, the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of the structures herein authorized, and the exercise of the privileges hereby granted, shall be in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 23, 1906": And provided further, That the time for completing said dam and appurtenances may be extended by the Secretary of War, in his discretion, two years beyond the time prescribed in the aforesaid act: And provided further, That the rights and privileges hereby granted may be assigned with the written authorization of the Secretary of War, or in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, but not otherwise: And provided further, That the Secretary of War, as a part of the conditions and stipulations referred to in said act, may, in his discretion, impose a reasonable annual charge or return, to be paid by the said corporation or its assigns to the United States, the proceeds thereof to be used for the development of navigation on the Connecticut River and the waters connected therewith. In fixing such charge, if any, the Secretary of War shall take into consideration the existing rights and property of said corporation and the amounts spent and required to be spent by it in improving the navigation of said river, and no charge shall be imposed which shall be such as to deprive the said corporation of a reasonable return on the fair value of such dam and appurtenant works and property, allowing for the cost of construction, maintenance, and renewal, and for depreciation charges.

SEC. 2. That the height to which said dam may be raised and maintained shall not be less than 39 feet above zero on the Hartford gauge: Provided, That said corporation shall permit the continuous discharge past said dam of all water flowing in the Connecticut River whenever the discharge into the pool created by the dam hereby authorized is 1,000 cubic feet per second or less, and at all greater discharges into said pool shall provide a minimum discharge past said dam of not less than 1,000 cubic feet per second: And provided further, That said corporation may, for not to exceed five hours between sunset and sunrise, limit the discharge past said dam to 500 cubic feet per second whenever such limitation will not, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, interfere with navigation. The measure of water thus to be discharged shall include all the water discharged through the lock herein provided for and the present locks and canal of said corporation: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall in any way authorize said corporation at any time or by any means to raise the surface of the river at the location just above the present Enfield Dam to any height which shall raise the surface of the river at the lower tailrace of the Chemical Paper Co. in Holyoke, Mass., higher than can result from the erection or maintenance of any dam or dams which said corporation is authorized to erect or maintain in accordance with the order and decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, passed June 16, 1884, in the case of The Holyoke Water Power Co. against The Connecticut River Co.

SEC. 3. That the said Connecticut River Co. shall build coincidently with the construction of the said dam and appurtenances, at a location to be provided by said corporation and approved by the Secretary of War, and in accordance with plans approved by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, a lock of such kind and size, and with such equipment and appurtenances as shall conveniently and safely accommodate the present and prospective commerce of the river, and when the said lock and appurtenances shall have been completed the said corporation shall convey the same to the United States, free of cost, together with title to such land as may be required for approaches to said lock and such land as may be necessary to the United States for the maintenance and operation thereof, and the United States shall maintain and operate the said lock and appurtenances for the benefit of navigation, and the said corporation shall furnish to the United Stats, free of charge, water power, or power generated from water power, for operating and lighting the said constructions; and no tolls or charges of any kind shall be imposed or collected for the passage of any boat through the said lock or through any of the locks or canal of said corporation.

SEC. 4. That compensation shall be made by the said Connecticut River Co. to all persons or corporations whose lands or other property may be taken, overflowed, or otherwise damaged by the construction, maintenance, and operation of the said dam, lock, and appurtenant and accessory works, in accordance with the laws of the State where such lands or other property may be situated; but the United States shall not be held to have incurred any liability for such damages by the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That upon the termination for any cause whatever of the authority, rights, and privileges granted hereby, or any renewal thereof, the United States may renew the same or the grant may be made or transferred to other parties. Unless the grant is renewed to the original grantee or its assigns, as herein provided, the United States shall pay or require its new grantee to pay to said original grantees or its assigns, as full compensation, the reasonable value of the improvements and appurtenant works constructed under the authority of this act and of the property belonging to said corporation necessary for the development hereby authorized, exclusive of the value of the authority hereby granted. Said improvements and appurtenant works and property shall include the lands and riparian rights acquired for the purposes of such development, the dam and other structures, and also the equipment useful and convenient for the generation of hydroelectric power or hydromechanical power and the transmission system from generation plant to initial points of distribution, but shall not include any other property whatsoever. Such reasonable value shall be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of War and the owners, and in case they can not agree, then by proceedings instituted in the United States district court for the condemnation of such properties. The basis for determining the value shall be the cost of replacing the structures necessary for the development and transmission of hydroelectric power by other structures capable of developing and transmitting the same amount of marketable power with equal efficiency, allowance being made for deterioration, if any, of the existing structures in estimating such efficiency, together with the fair value of other properties herein defined to which not more than 10 per cent may be added to compensate for the expenditure of initial cost and experimentation charges and other proper expenditures in the cost of the plant which may not be represented in the replacement valuation herein provided.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, it has become the practice of one or two gentlemen on this floor, who stand for this water-power bill as originally reported out, to say that every statement I make is not in accordance with the facts. Now, every statement I have made is in accordance with the facts, and I have not made any statement that is not admitted by these gentlemen themselves upon this floor. They seek to escape the force of my remarks about the bridge at Keokuk by saying it is not the Keokuk Dam Co.-Mississippi River Power Co. now asking for the right to put a bridge on these piers, but that it is the Intercity Bridge Co. I do not know who the Intercity Bridge Co. are, but I do know that in 1905 a company composed of citizens of Keokuk, and perhaps Hamilton also, came to this House and asked for this perpetual franchise which they now have there, upon the theory that it was a Keokuk and Hamilton industry that wanted the power; and I do know that immediately afterwards they sold that franchise to Hugh L. Cooper, who organized the Mississippi River Power Co. and built the dam, and I know they got $20,000 for it. I do not know who the Intercity Bridge Co. are. I have never investigated, but I will undertake to say, just as a guess at it—and I will probably guess correctly—that you will find among the incorporators of the Intercity Bridge Co. some of those Keokuk and Hamilton citizens who, for the benefit of Keokuk, obtained this franchise in 1905; and you will find, if this Intercity bridge bill passes this House, that they will turn the franchise over to the Mississippi River Power Co.

Now, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] to state whether he has investigated the question and if he has ascertained whether or not the Intercity Bridge Co. are composed largely of the same individuals who got the franchise to build a power dam there and then turned it over to Hugh L. Cooper, and through him to the Mississippi Power Co.? The gentleman does not seem to be here.

Mr. MANN. He is not on the floor at this moment.

Mr. RAINEY. I see the gentleman is not on the floor. I did not know that when I asked the question or I would not have asked it. I am sorry the gentleman from Iowa is not here. He states that I said that 104 steamboat companies were operating boats on this section of the river. I said nothing of the kind. I said that 104 boats or steamboat companies were authorized to operate on this section of the river, and that I had written to all of them, and that I got replies from such of those companies or boats as did actually operate upon this part of the river. Now, I see the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] has returned to the Hall. If he will take the trouble to examine the hearings on my Keokuk Dam resolution before the Committee on Rules of this House, which hearings have been printed, he will be able to inform himself and will find out something about his own district that he does not know.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. What replies did the gentleman get from steamboat men other than the Wisherd people, the Blair people, and the Streckfus people in regard to the boats operating in that particular region?

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman that I do not have the hearings before me, but the gentleman can examine them.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have examined them, and there is not a single letter except——

Mr. RAINEY. I will undertake to call the gentleman's attention to plenty of them.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There are letters from captains of boats, but they represent those three lines and no others.

Mr. RAINEY. According to the gentleman, these are the only companies operating on that section of the river. If that is true, then all the interests using that part of the river object to these piers. Now that the gentleman is here, will he state who comprise the Intercity Bridge Co.?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It is made up of 8 or 10 gentlemen from Keokuk and Hamilton.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman give me their names?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not know that I can give all the names. There is Mr. Charles R. Joy——

Mr. RAINEY. Was he one of the original company that obtained the charter to build the dam?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. No; he had nothing to do with it. Then there is Mr. A. E. Johnson.

Mr. RAINEY. Was he one of the original company?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He was one of the original Keokuk-Hamilton Co. which got the original franchise.

Mr. RAINEY. Which was afterwards transferred to the company that actually built the dam?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; but the gentleman said they got it without the expenditure of a dollar, which was not a correct statement.

Mr. RAINEY. They got $20,000 for it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They spent a whole lot of money. The gentleman probably does not know that the cities of Keokuk and Hamilton appropriated money out of their treasuries for that company to get their franchise and make their preliminary surveys, and so forth, amounting to more than $20,000, which was restored when Mr. Cooper purchased their rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section be closed at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FOWLER. Reserving the right to object, I want a few minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How many minutes?

Mr. FOWLER. Not to exceed five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section be concluded in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section be concluded in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa name some of the other members of the Intercity Bridge Co.?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Judge William Logan, I think.

Mr. RAINEY. He was one of the original company?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He was one of the original company. Then there is Mr. C. P. Dadant, of Hamilton.

Mr. RAINEY. He was one of the original company?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; and Mr. W. W. Wallace.

Mr. RAINEY. He was one of the original company?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. Who else?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not remember.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has named almost a majority of them—a majority of them evidently were also connected with the original company that obtained the original franchise to build this dam. Now, under those circumstances what will happen to this bridge franchise if the Intercity Bridge Co. get it?

The same thing will happen that did happen to this Keokuk Dam franchise. They propose, of course, to turn over this bridge franchise, if they get it, to the Mississippi River Power Co., or some one of its subsidiary companies, or some interest operating with the Mississippi River Power Co. Now, I do not care whether there is a bridge there or not; I was calling attention to the objection to putting these piers 175 feet apart. I want to ask another question of the gentleman from Iowa. How many of the public-service companies of the city of Keokuk has the Mississippi River Power Co. absorbed?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They have not absorbed any, but the Stone & Webster Co. have taken one at Keokuk and one from Madison, and the lighting privilege in Dallas City. Outside of that the Mississippi River Power Co. has absolutely no control.

Mr. RAINEY. The Stone & Webster Co. controls the Mississippi River Power Co.?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. No; they are the managing company. When these financial houses financed the proposition they looked for a company to operate, and in competition with others they chose the Stone & Webster Co.

Now, let me say a word about this bridge company; I know the gentleman from Illinois does not want to be unfair.

Mr. RAINEY. I certainly do not.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He says that the piers are only 175 feet apart. There are a lot of bridges between St. Louis and St. Paul with piers less than that distance apart, and the piers of the Keokuk Bridge only have 165 feet distance between them.

Mr. RAINEY. The piers are not in alignment.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. And they are 181 feet apart.

Mr. RAINEY. They all say that they are 175 feet apart and not in alignment, and that fact makes them in reality a much less distance apart than they in fact are.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Now, let me say——

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield further; I have not the time. That is the way with this matter all the way through. The Mississippi River Power Co. has not absorbed the public-service corporations of the city of Keokuk, but the Stone & Webster people have, and they control the Mississippi River Power Co. The Mississippi River Power Co. does not propose to build a bridge, but the Intercity Bridge Co. does, and that is composed of gentlemen who surrendered the original franchise to the Mississippi River Power Co. and who will surrender this bridge franchise to the same interests if they get it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is only one member of the Intercity Bridge Co. who has stock in the Mississippi River Power Co.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not say they had stock in it, but they sold it for $20,000, surrendered the franchise; and if they get this bridge franchise they will surrender it in the same way. I will say that I do not care how much the city of Keokuk surrenders to this water-power trust. I do not represent the city of Keokuk. I am simply calling attention to what has happened there and to what is going on all over the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in line 23, page 14, is a provision which is conditional for the purpose of taking over certain power given companies to construct dams in which it is provided that the Attorney General shall institute proceedings to take over this right, provided that the Secretary of War requests him to do so. The question that arises in my mind is, Why should you make the duty of the Department of Justice in enforcing the law conditional upon the will of anybody? Why not let the Attorney General have the duty resting upon him to discharge the duty under his conscience and his answer to the people for not discharging it? Why limit it to the request of the Secretary of War?

I know that the answer will be that the Secretary of War had this matter in charge, and that the Secretary of War is the all-knowing power as to whether a prosecution or action should be instituted for the purpose of taking over these rights. But if you make it conditional, as the bill does, then you give the Secretary of War the discretion to make discrimination between companies or individuals who are seeking control of hydroelectric power. So I think that the bill ought to be definite and fix the duty of the Attorney General and make him responsible to the people for not discharging that duty. Now, I will ask the chairman that question.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not only usual but wise that the department which has charge of the matter in a particular line of business or improvement shall itself be the judge of when there ought to be a lawsuit started. The Attorney General is not supposed to look into the details of every department. The Secretary of War is charged with the administration of these and similar laws, and when he finds it necessary to bring a suit he brings it to the attention of the Attorney General.

Mr. FOWLER. I used to have an old neighbor who said that one boy in a family was a boy, two boys was a half a boy, and three boys was no boy at all. That is what you have here in your bill. Why do you not throw the responsibility on one man, and let him take that responsibility in discharging his duty? Why have two boys in this question? According to my old friend that lived close by my father's house, you have got half an Attorney General and half a Secretary of War.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is not that what the gentleman from Illinois is trying to get, to have two boys actually instead of one? Under the bill as it now is it is the duty of the Secretary of War to control all these things, but, not being a lawyer, he employs the lawyer which the Government provides to help him.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman from Missouri does not make any progress in this matter at all. If he is going to leave the question of law to a lawyer, the bill puts the responsibility on the Attorney General to bring the lawsuit, and he is the man who ought to have the responsibility, for he knows the law and is the one who ought to bring the lawsuit. He ought to have the responsibility. Your old rube back in your district will complain of you if you stand here enforcing these ideas, this irresponsible method of enforcing the law. The gentleman had better go back and consult old rube before he takes such a position on the floor.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. FOWLER. I do not want to yield. I yielded for a question, and now the gentleman wants to make a speech. I always listen to the gentleman from Missouri with a great deal of pleasure and go back and tell my constituents what he says on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all dams which may be authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act whenever Congress determines that the conditions of consent have been violated. In such case the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested in such dam.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 7, after the word "act," strike out the rest of the section.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, this section as written into the bill reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act only when Congress determines that the conditions of the consent have been violated. I think Congress should have the right, and undoubtedly has the right, to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time, the same as it has any piece of general legislation. It should have the right to alter or repeal this act as to any or all dams that may be authorized in accordance with it at any time that Congress deems it wise in the public interest to do so. This bill undertakes to confer and does confer a charter that runs for 50 years. Of course, you can not have a charter that runs for 50 years and still have the right to alter, amend, or repeal the charter without assuming a liability to the grantees for that period of the charter which has not yet expired. If this amendment of striking out all the words after "act" be adopted, so that the section shall read:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all dams which may be authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If I understand the gentleman, he desires to strike out all after word "act," in line 7, and just leave it that the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all dams that may be authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If we strike that out, and Congress passes on the question of ordering the repeal, it is all the same thing. I do not object to the amendment. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the provision as it stands in the bill, and more opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS]. We have the right to alter, amend, or repeal any act of Congress. It is not necessary that we insert that in the law; but when you want to affect anything which is already done by some private individual under an act of Congress, you must reserve the right to alter, amend, or repeal, or you may run up against a liability on the part of the Government. We grant to some corporations the power to construct a dam, as we have granted in the past, and we want to change the condition and still keep that company under the general act. Well, we change the act. It can not affect that company unless we have reserved the right to do it without liability. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] proposes to let it stand so that we have the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act; but if we do that, and it injures the company, they have a claim against the United States which they can enforce. It is taking private property without compensation. I worked for a long time over the original provision which is in the law. We may make a great many changes in the course of time with reference to these laws affecting dams, and there is no reason why, if we do that and make it applicable to an existing dam, we should give the Government the responsibility of paying the company for any changes that are made. In an ordinary case the right to alter, amend, or repeal is enough of itself. We put that provision in every special bill for a dam that we pass; but here is the governing principle, and we ought to have the right to alter, amend, or repeal that without paying for the opportunity, and if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, we will never make any change about any dam that a claim will not be brought against the Government. Nor am I willing, so far as I am concerned, to take the original in the bill and say that we shall have the right to alter, amend, or repeal only when the dam company has violated the conditions of the consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In a moment. All of these companies throughout the United States and elsewhere must be taught that the governing power reserves the right to regulate these franchises which it grants. When I was a young man in college the State of Illinois was then starting out to regulate railroads and warehouses, and it was held by the railroads and the warehouse men to be something monstrous. The end of the world would come if the State were given authority to regulate railroad rates or warehouse rates. People used to ride free on the Illinois Central Railroad, up and down past the station where I was at school, because the railroad company would not accept the fare fixed by the State law, and the people would not pay any more fare. The matter finally went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that the Government had the power to regulate that sort of public utility. Is it now proposed to give away that power? That is what this amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire would do. That is what the provision in the bill itself would do. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. As I understand the gentleman, it would suit him to strike out the part of the bill that is in italics, namely, "whenever Congress determines that the conditions of consent has been violated," and leave the original section.

Mr. MANN. Yes; leave it as the law now stands.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I agree thoroughly with the gentleman, and I will ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to modify his amendment to that effect.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I will accept that, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to strike out the words "whenever Congress determines that the conditions of consent have been violated."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MOON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire that he be permitted to modify his amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification of amendment of Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire: Page 15, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "whenever Congress determines that the conditions of consent have been violated."

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute that section 13 be stricken from the bill, and I do that——

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not accept that.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota (continuing). And I do that for the reason that as the section appears in the bill it is a limitation upon the power of Congress to amend, alter, or repeal a regulatory law and would be unwise and unsafe legislation. The Constitution gives to Congress the right to amend, alter, or repeal any law which it may enact. It is not necessary that Congress should reserve that right in its legislation. It is true that such a policy has become customary. It serves notice on the grantees, as in this case, that it is the intention of Congress, when it deems it wise, to either amend, alter, or repeal the law, and the section as it appears in this bill can have no other effect than to take away from Congress the constitutional power to amend, alter, or repeal this act. There is a great deal in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, that if we are to have this section in the bill it is for the purpose of serving notice upon those who act upon this legislation that Congress will at some future time, when circumstances warrant, amend this law. But further than that I do not wish to yield, because if we are at this late day going to enact legislation which is going to deprive Congress of the power to regulate such institutions as this bill is aimed at, then we are going backward instead of forward. True, 50 years ago the idea of regulating public-service corporations or railroads or steamboat lines was unheard of, but to-day monopoly is abroad, and the only way that we can curtail it and conserve to the public for the public use and the public benefit the great resources of this country is by curbing monopoly by wise legislation, and if there ever was an unwise piece of legislation attempted it is the attempt to insert in this law section 13.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota. This is one section of the existing law which has been very bitterly opposed by the special interests and they would be exceedingly glad to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota prevail. There is no constitutional authority; the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken in that respect, authorizing us to repeal a law which thereby seizes private property and confiscates it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state on what authority he bases that proposition?

Mr. HULINGS. The Dartmouth College case.

Mr. MANN. No; I am not basing it on the Dartmouth College case, that relates to States. Why, I base it upon authorities all through the courts. The United States Government can not confiscate the property of private individuals. It has no authority to seize the property, the Constitution itself says so in so many words.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The Chandler-Dunbar case sustains that.

Mr. MANN. We must preserve our rights. If we make an amendment which affects injuriously those things which people own—of course, we can amend the law as to the future at any time. We have the power to amend the laws as to the future—but when you amend and thereby seize private property unless this provision is in the bill you have to pay for it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Does the gentleman contend that it is necessary to have a provision in the bill reserving to Congress the right to amend or repeal a regulatory law? This has nothing to do with the seizing of property, but a law which simply prescribes rules and regulations upon which property may be owned and used.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we might have the power to repeal a regulatory law if that is all this was, but this law in effect is a contract when it is made use of under a special act of Congress creating or authorizing a franchise to be given, and when that franchise holder constructs a dam under the provisions of the law and invests his money the Government can not take that away from the owner without compensation unless we have reserved the right to do so. That is elemental.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment. I introduced it for the purpose of calling attention to this section.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to perfect this, and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. What has become of the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, the gentleman from Minnesota, by the consent of the committee, having withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. I shall suspend now and support the Stevens amendment, and then I desire to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the section as amended now differs from the present law in that in line 6 the word "authorized" is used in section 13 of the pending bill and in the present law the word "constructed," making it that Congress has the right to repeal a law as to any dam authorized by this bill, whereas the original act provides as to any dam constructed, so I move to amend by adding, after the word "authorized," the words "or constructed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 6, after the word "authorized," insert the words "or constructed."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is not the term "authorized" used here a little broader and better than the original term which I used?

Mr. BRYAN. Not the term "authorized or constructed." I do not think it is broader than both.

Mr. MANN. You can not construct until it is authorized. This will apply between the time the dam is authorized and the time it is constructed.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I think that the fact we have amended the original law by inserting the word "authorized" will raise a question of interpretation, and it is very reasonable that one who has constructed a dam will say that this original act was amended so you can repeal an act where authority has been granted, but not where the grantee had acted on that authority and constructed his dam.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if a dam is constructed, it must previously have been authorized, and so the case would be met, anyhow.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; but we have it specifically enacted here it was only in case of authority granted. Why did we amend the act? I think that it makes it broader by saying "authorized or constructed."

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. The language expressly refers to dams which may be authorized, and there can not be dams until they have been constructed, and "authorized" covers the project for all time and eternity, if the project lasts that long.

Mr. BRYAN. I think there will arise a question about the interpretation of the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of War, upon the advice and with the approval of the Chief of Engineers, may lease to any applicant having complied with the laws of the State in which the dam is constructed or to be constructed by the United States, the right to develop power from the surplus water over and above that required for navigation at any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed, either with or without contribution by the applicant, and owned by the United States, and on such terms as may be deemed by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers for the best interests of the United States, and in awarding such lease preference shall be given to the applicant whose plans are deemed by any action of Congress or by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers to be best adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water-power resources of the region: Provided, That no lease shall be made to any private corporation or applicant operating for private profit for a longer term than 50 years, and that the provisions of this act, so far as applicable, shall be made a part of the terms and conditions of any such lease, and all such leases and the parties thereto and the terms and conditions thereof shall be reported annually to Congress.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into leases for the use of surplus water and water power generated at dams and works constructed wholly or in part by the United States in the interest of navigation, at such rates or such terms and conditions and for such periods of time, not to exceed 50 years, and with such provision for the periodical readjustment of rentals as may seem to him just, equitable, and expedient, subject, however, to the provisions of this act governing the authorization, maintenance, and operation of power plants, and to all regulations governing the use and disposition of the power, so far as the same may be applicable. And all such leases, the parties thereto and the terms and conditions thereof, shall be reported annually to Congress: Provided, That said Secretary of War in making such leases shall give preference to any municipal corporation or other public corporation not operated for private profit."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the committee thinks that is more likely to serve the purpose intended, it is all right with me. I can not see any difference.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, before that is acted upon I would like to make a statement, because I am responsible for this section. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] has practically offered the suggestions originally forwarded in the bill of the Secretary of War. I assumed the responsibility of presenting the changes to the committee, for the reason that there is a very important matter, affecting my State and section of the country, which has been pending before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for several years, covered by this section, and I have already mentioned it in debate to this committee. I am fearful that the provision of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] and the provision of the Secretary of War could not meet our situation. You will notice that the amendment suggested by my friend from New Hampshire makes a straight provision for a term of 50 years in all cases, and that a preference shall be given to municipalities. I think it a very great mistake to give a preference to municipalities directly in the law, for this reason: At the present time the Committee on Rivers and Harbors constructs these dams solely for the purposes of navigation. The plans of the dams and locks, their location and operation, consider navigation alone, and the question of water power from them is of slight consequence. It is planned from the use of the structures that any water power generated would be merely incidental and of very little value. And if the committee wishes, I will place in my remarks a report from the Secretary of War, which will be found in Senate Document No. 57, Sixty-second Congress, first session, covering all the plants which have been constructed since the history of the Government where the water power on Government dams has been leased by the Secretary of War under authority from Congress. And in nearly all of these cases the language of the law so authorizing such leasing has been as it appears in the bill, namely, giving the Secretary of War authority to make the best terms he can without any preference or any limitations as to terms or tenure.

Now, the result would be that if the amendment of the gentleman were adopted the municipalities situated upon navigable rivers would want to do two things: They would want to have the plans of the dams changed so that navigation would no longer be the primary consideration, but that water power would be the main consideration; and, secondly, these municipalities would endeavor to have dams constructed not so much for navigation, or ostensibly for navigation, but in reality for water power.

The result would be that there would be an increasing demand for these improvements, which would cost the Treasury of the United States enormous sums of money, and from which only slight revenue could be realized. It would enormously increase the pressure of the "pork-barrel" system, and the people outside of the favored section would then pay their money into the Treasury for the sake of helping favored municipalities get a chance to buy water power from water-power dams cheaper than could be secured in any other way and far cheaper than the investment of the Government would warrant. I think it would lead to the increase of the pressure of "pork-barrel" methods, which would be a scandal and injurious to all development of our navigable rivers. It would so affect our transportation interests that the improvement of navigable rivers would be imperiled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amount which the Treasury gets from all the Government dams which have been constructed since the beginning of construction, as I say, is insignificant. There are only about, I think, 28 of them in which power is sold, and 17 of them are in the State of Ohio, on the Muskingum River. These are all insignificant and the amount realized is negligible. So the amount to be realized would be comparatively small as covered by the amendment of my friend from New Hampshire, and the Secretary must do the best he can to lease many of them on any terms he can. Now, it was in my mind in making this change from the Secretary's provision to that in the bill was the best use of Government dam which is now being constructed between St. Paul and Minneapolis, and which will be finished next year. For three years I have had a bill before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors seeking the best use of this incidental power and making this proposition to the Government. The State of Minnesota has had created by its legislature a corporation without any capital stock, without any officers having power to receive any salaries. There is no possibility of any individual getting any profit out of it in any way, directly or indirectly. This corporation wishes to lease this power from the Government and pay for the plant, 3 per cent on the increased cost of the dam and works, which, of course, practically pays for the plant at the rate of interest now paid by the Government. If so acquired this corporation would divide the power into four parts, first giving the United States all it needs, and the United States is now paying about $28,000 a year for power in those two cities and at Fort Snelling, as the engineers report. Second, to give the State of Minnesota what it needs for the use of its university at Minneapolis, which would be a large amount, because the university is doing a large amount of valuable and expensive experimental work in its laboratories and shops. Lastly, the remainder of the power would be equally divided between the two cities to be used exclusively for public purposes. No one but the public could receive and use of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my friend this question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to ask if he construes the language of the proposed amendment to mean that the Secretary of War is compelled to accept a proposition from municipalities, even though they are not attractive to him or within the purview of the intention of the project?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, he would be obliged to give them the preference.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would they not have to bring their propositions reasonably within the provisions as to the intentions and purposes?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly. I will come to that later if my time allows.

The point is this, that the proposition submitted by the municipal company of Minnesota would pay the United States for this dam. It then gives the United States the right to use its power and share with whatever reduction of cost there may be, which would be considerable; and then, of course, the State of Minnesota would have its share and its large service in the use of its university. Lastly, the cities would have their public lighting at a very great reduction from present expense. No one could get any profit. The whole benefit would go to the public.

Now, the point is that the committee will realize that this is an important matter, to be fixed so it can be practically administered. It will require a million dollars at first to finance it, and it can not be done on a 50-year basis, such as provided in the amendment of the gentleman. That is the point I desire to call attention to in this amendment and why I hope it will not be pressed. This amendment prohibits our plan being made effective by reason of the imposition of a 50-year term. If the committee adopts it, of course we can not finance our plan, and these very water-power interests which gentlemen have been so vociferous in denouncing will have a monopoly of that water power and the public utilities in that section of the United States, State, and city. The Stone-Webster people have the monopoly of the water power of that section, and they would like to acquire this dam, of course; but if they can not do that, they would like to have no other company nor the public corporation acquire it or use it.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. What reason is there why the municipality can not make a lease for 50 years under the terms of this bill when they have a preference, and a private corporation could?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. For this reason: There are now existing term contracts which make it impossible. The plant could not be put in operation at once. The cities and the States can not give their credit to the financing of the scheme. The backing on a financial basis must be the actual contracts that are entered into.

As I say, it will cost probably a million dollars to inaugurate the plant and build a power house and a transmission plant, which will be very expensive. The result is that the contracts which would be in sight to start the thing, to pay 3 per cent to the United States and the transmission required will not be sufficient to float the financing. The plan must be extended gradually, and the bonds can not be floated except for a long time. You realize these power companies do not like this sort of plan. It seriously interferes with their present monopoly and projects. It is easy enough for them to prevent the flotation of the bonds, because there are only a few places where they can be conserved. If these companies refuse to handle this business, the power companies will do what they please with their monopoly and this power. If they can use it they can bid for it, and if they do not want to take it they can prevent anybody else from getting it. You are putting the whole matter into their hands by limiting the authority of the Secretary of War.

I have provided for two distinct classes of applicants in the bill. The first could be the private corporations. If any private corporation secures this power it would have a 50-year term, just as the gentleman's amendment in the bill provides. But the public corporations would be under the provision of the law as it exists now, as to practically all the other Government dams heretofore constructed, giving the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers authority to make contracts for the best interests of the United States.

This fact, too, should be had in mind. The city of St. Paul and the city of Minneapolis have furnished the flowage rights for this valuable property of the Government. They own the banks of the river as part of their park systems. They have given to the United States those rights practically for nothing, although they are worth very many thousands of dollars. They have done that on the presumption that the United States would use this power or treat them fairly in the use of it. These facts are given in the hearings had before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I believe we have had two hearings. If you insist upon the 50-year period it destroys our contribution to the extent of several hundred thousand dollars, and it would give the water-power interests a monopoly of the electric business in that section of the country.

I hope the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] will not insist upon his amendment. He will notice how we have tried to guard the very thing he desires to protect. We confined the private contracts to 50 years, and made the terms of this bill applicable.

As to public leases, we have left them subject first to the committees of Congress. I think the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, when they frame the river and harbor bills and provide for these dams, ought to outline what should be done with them; and it strikes me that our method as proposed here is better than to lay down a single broad, rigid rule. If the Congress does not provide for it, then we leave the law as it stands. Thirty dams now, practically, are operated under the language of section 14 as it stands in the bill. So I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman contend that they can not finance that proposition up there except on a perpetual lease?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. The Secretary of War ought to have authority to meet an emergency. We do not want a perpetual lease. An indeterminate lease is what I had in mind. The Secretary of War could meet the situation as it would be presented to him. He does it now as to these 30 dams, and it has worked admirably. We ask that this same authority be extended to these dams hereafter to be constructed which now exists. Your general theory may be all right as to private dams, but in matters of this kind the plan which has worked well for a generation can be safely followed.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the only substantial change made in section 14 by the amendment which I have offered is that no lease of water-power rights to anyone shall be for a longer period than 50 years.

Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about the local situation in Minnesota. It did seem to me, and it seems to me now, that no lease of water-power rights which belong to the Government should be given in perpetuity to any corporation, private or public. The Federal Government should keep control of that which it owns, and——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes; certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would the gentleman think it safe to invest the Secretary of War with discretion where he deemed it to be in the public interest to make grants to municipalities, revocable in his discretion after the end of 50 years?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. If the lease of the power was revocable at the end of 50 years, either by the Secretary of War or by Congress, that, of course, I think, would keep the matter in the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would not the purpose of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] be served by making that exception in the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire; that is, in a municipal corporation, where the public interest seems to demand it, the Secretary of War should make it revocable after 50 years in his discretion?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, 50 years in itself is a very long period for an irrevocable lease to be given by the Federal Government to anybody. While I personally would be sorry that any particular project in Minnesota should be injured by my amendment, I still believe it to be against public policy for the Federal Government to give away forever, or in perpetuity, or for a longer period than 50 years, a public franchise which belongs to all the Nation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Did not the gentleman understand me to say first that we do not want to grant it in perpetuity; second, that we do not want to give it away, but we want them to pay all it is worth?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I do not think the power ought to be placed in any executive officer of the Government to grant a charter for a longer period than 50 years, and certainly not in perpetuity, which he might do if the original provision were adopted.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman know that there are 30 dams operating now under identically the same language? I will place a list of them in the RECORD.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Can the gentleman tell me whether the Secretary has granted any permanent charters?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; to none of them. I will put them all in the RECORD.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Has the Secretary granted any charter for a longer time than 50 years?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I do not think he ought to do so.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this amendment, one of the main points is to give preference to municipal corporations over private corporations.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment to be a good one in this particular: If it does give municipal corporations an advantage over private corporations, it serves the public interest to a greater degree than section 14 now in the bill. Recently I received from the cities of Seattle and Tacoma some data on hydroelectric matters, and I was struck particularly by one paragraph in the report of the superintendent of lighting of the city of Seattle, in which he says:

From the standpoint of a revenue producer, as an agency to bring commercial industries to our city, and as a factor in providing comforts for the home, Seattle's municipal light and power plant and system is the city's largest utility and its greatest. No single agency in the city of Seattle has so great an opportunity to be a city builder nor will play so important a part in winning and holding for this city the commercial supremacy of the Pacific coast.

Seattle, Mr. Chairman, is the finest lighted city in America. We boast of our Capital City, Washington, as the city beautiful. This is a beautiful city, Mr. Chairman, but if the Congress had provided the people here with as fine a municipal lighting plant as the enterprising citizens of Seattle now own, this city could afford to "turn on the light" and chase the darkness out of the streets and make more cheerful the homes of these people, and all at a rate of approximately 50 per cent of the price now charged for light service. Our cities, with their 16 and 42 story buildings, are lighted from street to dome; thousands of electric signs and great woven mazes and strings of lighted bulbs glorify our cities away yonder by the western sea; and all this, Mr. Chairman, because of municipal ownership.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it would be to the advantage of the public if the Department of the Interior would rule or if Congress would enact legislation providing that any municipality within a certain radius or district should have the right to locate and reserve for a number of years any water location capable of developing hydroelectric power found anywhere on the public domain, to the end that the people of any city could have the time necessary to develop the power for use of its people, without being interfered with by private concerns.

I wish to call the attention of Congress to the advantages of Pacific coast cities, showing that where the municipality owns the hydroelectric plant the price per kilowatt hour to the consumer is cut in two.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that when private companies had the exclusive franchise, and furnished light to consumers, the price was as high or higher than the consumers now pay in this city—Washington, the Capital of our Nation.

TACOMA, ENTERPRISING CITY.

In the city of Tacoma a few years ago the people paid 11 cents per kilowatt hour for light, and paid that price to a private company to which the good people of Tacoma had generously given a valuable franchise.

The city of Tacoma finally put in its own equipment, but had no power plant. A private concern had excess power, and it offered to the city of Tacoma a contract to furnish light for something like 8 mills, or a price less than 1 cent per kilowatt hour, for which they had been charging to consumers over their own lines and equipment 11 cents. The city of Tacoma took up the proposition, and sold to its patrons electric light for the lighting of private residences at the rate of 6 cents per kilowatt hour, practically cutting in two the rate which had been formerly charged by the private corporation. I have data showing that while the Stone and Webster people were furnishing power to the city of Tacoma at 8 mills, and the city of Tacoma was reselling and furnishing it to its patrons over municipal equipment for 6 cents per kilowatt hour, neighboring cities, receiving its light from a private concern, were paying 11 cents per kilowatt hour, the power coming from identically the same source.

This goes to show that the public utilities of the country ought to go first to the municipalities, because in that way it brings the greatest amount of good to the people, and as a revenue producer the western cities which own hydroelectric plants have reduced their municipal taxes, this being due to earnings from the municipal plant, even when the service was furnished at greatly reduced rates.

Mr. Chairman, I can not emphasize too strongly the advantages of municipal ownership of public utilities.

The city of Tacoma, a great manufacturing and commercial city, demonstrates the worth of municipal ownership. The lighting and power rates of that city are probably the lowest in the country. Great manufacturing establishments use electric power. For some years a logging company a few miles from the city used electric power. Out in the harbor, as you approach the city at night, you are impressed with the magnificence of the electric lighting.

Must I repeat, Mr. Chairman, it is due to municipal ownership?

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD some figures showing advantages of municipal ownership of public utilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection:

The matter is as follows:

TACOMA LIGHT RATES.

SEC. 17. Rates for illumination: The rates for electric current for illuminating purposes shall be for the quantity used in any one month, as indicated by the meter or meters which shall be installed on the service for the purpose of registering the quantity of electric current used, and except where otherwise provided shall be as follows:

The minimum charge shall be 50 cents per month.

For 8 kilowatt hours or less per month or fraction thereof, 50 cents.

From 8 to 50 kilowatt hours per month or fraction thereof, 5½ cents per kilowatt hour.

For each additional kilowatt hour in excess of 50 and up to 100 kilowatt hours per month or fraction thereof, 5 cents per kilowatt hour.

For each additional kilowatt hour in excess of 100 and up to 2,000 per month or fraction thereof, 4 cents per kilowatt hour.

For each additional kilowatt hour in excess of 2,000 in any one month or fraction thereof, 3 cents per kilowatt hour.

Rates for lighting and cooking: The rates for electric current for combination lighting and cooking, and the method of classification upon which said rates are based shall be as follows:

Method of classification: Each dwelling shall be divided into two parts. The first part shall consist of those rooms most used, including living room, parlors, library, dining room, kitchen, and pantry, and shall be designated the "working part." The second part shall consist of those rooms less frequently used, such as hallways, bedrooms, bathrooms, etc., and shall be designated the "idle part." For the purpose of computing the floor space as provided in the schedules given below, all the floor space of the "working part" of the house shall be counted and one-half of the area of the "idle part," and the total shall constitute the equivalent floor space of the house.

SCHEDULE CLASS "A."

Includes all dwelling houses and apartments having a floor space, computed as above, of not more than 500 square feet:

Minimum charge, $1 per month.

For the first 15 kilowatt hours used during any month, 6 cents per kilowatt hour.

All current in excess of 15 kilowatt hours during any month, 1 cent per kilowatt hour.

SCHEDULE CLASS "B."

Includes all dwelling houses and apartments having a floor space of not less than 500 nor more than 1,000 square feet:

Minimum charge, $1.50 per month.

For the first 25 kilowatt hours used in any month, 6 cents per kilowatt hour.

All current in excess of 25 kilowatt hours in any month, 1 cent per kilowatt hour.

SCHEDULE CLASS "C."

Includes dwelling houses and apartments having a floor space, computed as above, of not less than 1,000 nor more than 2,000 square feet:

Minimum charge, $1.50 per month.

For the first 40 kilowatt hours used in any one month, 6 cents per kilowatt hour.

All current used in excess of 40 kilowatt hours during any month, 1 cent per kilowatt hour.

SCHEDULE CLASS "D."

Includes dwelling houses and apartments having a floor space, computed as above, of over 2,000 square feet:

Minimum charge, $1.50 per month.

For the first 60 kilowatt hours used during any month, 6 cents per kilowatt hour

All current used in excess of 60 kilowatt hours during any month, 1 cent per kilowatt hour.

[As amended by ordinance No. 5364, passed June 4, 1913.]

SEC. 18. The rates for electric current for hospitals and kindred charitable institutions shall be the same as those prescribed in section 17, subject to a discount of 20 per cent provided the previous month's bill is paid on or before the 15th day of each month.

SEC. 19. Rates for power: The price for current for industrial power shall be as follows:

SEC. 20. Special rates: Special rates may be made by the superintendent, with the concurrence of the commissioner of light and water, for current used between 8 a. m. and 4 p. m., or at such other hours as in his judgment may seem expedient.

SEATTLE LIGHTING RATES.

The rate schedule now in use by the lighting department became effective July 1, 1912. The rates in detail are printed below. For residence lighting the rate is 6 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 60 kilowatt hours used per month and 4 cents for all current above 60 kilowatt hours per month, and the minimum monthly charge is 50 cents. Rates for power and for ousiness lighting are arranged on a sliding schedule, which makes the rate lower the more hours per day current is used. The basis of each schedule is a logarithmic curve, as shown in figure 2. The actual price per kilowatt hour obtained during the year 1913 was for residence lighting, 5.988 cents; for business lighting, 2.757 cents; and for power, 1.549 cents. The rate schedule in detail as fixed by ordnance follows:

A. For all constant potential arc and incandescent loads used for residence lighting purposes:

0 to 60 kilowatt hours, per month, 6 cents per kilowatt hour.

All over 60 kilowatt hours, per month, 4 cents per kilowatt hour.

The above rates include the use of clear carbon or metallized filament lamps. The same schedule of charges shall be made for churches as for residence lighting. The minimum charge for each meter installed for residence lighting shall be 50 cents per month. In apartment houses each apartment shall be classed as a separate residence.

B. For all constant potential arc and incandescent loads used for business lighting purposes:

0 to 100 kilowatt hours per month, inclusive, per connected kilowatt, 5 cents.

139 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 4 cents.

213 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 3 cents.

278 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 2½ cents.

388 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 2 cents.

593 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1½ cents.

720 and over kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1.32 cents.

Intermediate kilowatt hours consumption shall be charged at intermediate rates. A minimum rate shall be charged for all business lighting, such minimum to be fixed by the superintendent, but in no case to be less than $1 per month.

C. Rates for power purposes based on a connected load of less than 1 horsepower shall be computed on same basis as business lighting rates. Rates for power purposes based on a connected load of 1 to 20 horsepower, inclusive, of 746 watts per horsepower per month, shall be as follows:

0 to 100 kilowatt hours per month, inclusive, per connected kilowatt, 4 cents.

146 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 3 cents.

187 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 2½ cents.

250 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 2 cents.

366 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1½ cents.

628 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1 cent.

720 and over kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 0.9 cent.

Intermediate kilowatt hours consumption shall be charged at intermediate rates.

Rates for power purposes based on a connected load of 21 to 100 horsepower, inclusive, of 746 watts per horsepower per month, shall be as follows:

0 to 100 kilowatt hours per month, inclusive, per connected kilowatt, 4 cents.

138 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 3 cents.

219 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 2 cents.

304 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1½ cents.

480 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1 cent.

540 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 0.9 cent.

720 and over kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 0.7 cent.

Intermediate kilowatt hours consumption shall be charged at intermediate rates

Rates for power purposes based on a connected load of 101 horsepower and over, of 746 watts per horsepower per month, shall be as follows:

0 to 100 kilowatt hours per month, inclusive, per connected kilowatt, 3 cents.

157 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 2 cents.

215 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1½ cents.

336 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 1 cent.

430 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 0.8 cent.

590 kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 0.6 cent.

720 and over kilowatt hours per month, per connected kilowatt, 0.5 cent.

Intermediate kilowatt hours consumption shall be charged at intermediate rates.

A minimum charge of $1 per month shall be made for each connected horsepower.

The rate for electric elevator service shall be 2½ cents per kilowatt hour, subject to a minimum monthly charge of $1 per connected horsepower.

The rate for street lighting shall be 4½ cents per kilowatt hour, measured at the substation, lamps and maintenance included.

Before the municipal plant was projected the rate of residence lighting for the first current used per month was 20 cents per kilowatt hour. In 1902, when construction work was begun on the municipal plant, the private corporation reduced its rate to 12 cents per kilowatt hour. When the first contract was taken by the municipal plant in 1905 its rates for residence lighting were fixed at 8½ cents for the first 20 kilowatt hours per month, 7½ cents for the second 20 kilowatt hours per month, 6½ cents for the third 20 kilowatt hours per month, and 4 cents for all in excess of 60 kilowatt hours per month. At this time the private corporation lowered its rate to 10 cents for the first 20 kilowatt hours, 9 cents for the second 20 kilowatt hours, and 8 cents for the third 20 kilowatt hours, with a 10 per cent discount for prompt payment.

In the beginning of 1910, when the number of customers of the municipal plant had begun to increase rapidly, the private corporation again reduced its rates to 9½, 8½, and 7½ cents, with 10 per cent discount for prompt payment, which made its rate practically equivalent to that of the municipal plant. In June, 1911, the municipal plant lowered its rate for residence lighting to 7 cents for the first 60 kilowatt hours and 4 cents for all in excess of 60 kilowatt hours per month, and at the same time reduced the minimum monthly charge which had heretofore been $1 to 75 cents. In November, 1911, the private corporation reduced its rate to meet that of the city. In June, 1912, the municipal plant again reduced its rate to 6 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 60 kilowatt hours per month and 4 cents for all in excess of 60 kilowatt hours per month, and fixed the minimum monthly charge at 50 cents. The private corporation reduced its rate to meet that of the city in July of the same year. While it would be impracticable to quote all the various rates for business and power that have been in effect in the city, these rates have, in general, declined since the municipal plant began operating in a manner similar to the rates for residence lighting.

The rate charged by the private corporation for street lighting in 1905 was $66 per year per 6.6 ampere arc lamp, and $15 per year per 30 candlepower incandescent. The rate charged by the municipal plant up to 1913 was $54 per year per 6.6 ampere arc, and $13.80 per year per 40 candlepower incandescent. This was a reduction of 18 hours per month and 4 cents for all in excess of 60 kilowatt hours per month per cent for the arc lamp, and an 8 per cent reduction in price with 33 per cent increase in light for the incandescent lamp. When the cluster lighting system was constructed, the allowance from the general fund to the lighting department was:

5-globe cluster lights, 200 watt	$42
3-globe cluster lights, 120 watt	30
1-globe cluster lights, 75 watt	21

At the beginning of 1913 the rate fixed by ordinance for street lighting was 4½ cents per kilowatt hour for all current used, measured at the distributing station. This rate includes maintenance and operation of the entire street-lighting system.

Under the new rate any increase in the efficiency of lighting or distribution will go to benefit the city. With the introduction of the new nitrogen-filled tungsten lamps by the lighting department there has been a marked decrease in the rate per candlepower per year for street lighting.

CITY LIGHT.

(Bulletin No. 11.)

Do you know, Mr. Taxpayer, that your city light plant is the foremost municipal plant in America? It has made good. It is in no sense a tax burden. It has cut the rates for lighting your homes to one-third the former rates. The correct financial statement for 1913 is as follows:

Revenues.

Sales of current to private individuals	$659,673.08
Miscellaneous revenues	5,714.28
Municipal buildings and street lighting	245,089.99
Total revenues	910,477.35

Expenses.
Operation, maintenance, and reconstruction	358,861.82
Interest	83,625.00
Depreciation	193,332.85
Sinking fund	32,400.00
Total expenses	668,219.67
Net surplus earnings	242,257.68
Total	910,477.35

Mr. Taxpayer, we have invested $1,500,000 of our earnings in plant extension; we have forced a reduction in light rates amounting to a saving of $3,000,000 annually on your light and power bills. This is equal to three-quarters of the taxes you pay to run your city government. Watch for our next bulletin.

J. D. ROSS,
Superintendent of Lighting.

Mr. Chairman, can any man look over these facts and then doubt the wisdom of municipal ownership of public utilities?

In the year 1913 the net surplus earnings, clear of all expenses, including depreciation, brought to the people of the city of Seattle $242,257.68; and that amount, sir, at the extremely low rates above given.

At that rate of earnings, the city of Washington, a city of approximately the same population, where the expenses and depreciation should not exceed in amount the Seattle figures—and would not if Great Falls were developed—and with the present rates charged here, this city should have net earnings of over three-quarters of a million dollars annually.

The people should have this benefit. It is due them. The administration should wake up on this question of municipal ownership, develop Great Falls, take over the lighting and street railway systems, and demonstrate to the country that it recognizes the common rights of the whole people.

This amendment giving municipalities preference over private concerns should carry; common right demands it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the proviso insert:

"Provided, That as between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder, due regard shall be given to the use and purpose for which such permit is required, priority of purpose and of benefits conferred by such permit, and project to rank in the following order:

"First. Benefits to navigation and conservation of water resources.

"Second. Public use of the State, the municipal subdivisions thereof, and public institutions.

"Third. Industrial use for agriculture and mining.

"Fourth. Commercial power for sale, barter, and exchange, and for use by public-service corporations.

"Fifth. Use for manufacturing industries."

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the law of British Columbia on this subject, enacted in 1909 and amended in 1911. It is as follows:

All such licenses shall be issued with due regard to the purposes for which they are required and according to the following order, except in so far as such order is varied by regulation or by direction of the minister: First, licenses for domestic purposes; second, licenses for municipal purposes; third, licenses for irrigation purposes; fourth, licenses for steam or manufacturing purposes; fifth, licenses for power purposes; sixth, licenses for mining purposes; seventh, licenses for lumbering purposes.

Gentlemen, it occurs to me that any bill that this House passes having for its purpose the regulation of the construction of dams across navigable rivers, and the regulation of such dams and the power and electric current generated thereby, should include the provisions in reference to priority of purpose and use which our neighbor to the north has seen fit to adopt and make a part of its laws on this subject. My colleague has pictured the true situation at Minneapolis and St. Paul, and it would be an injustice to these cities if they were compelled to go into the open market and bid for this power against the trust that has control of practically all the water powers of the State of Minnesota except this high dam. I believe the term of the lease could be safely left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, as provided in the committee bill; however, the term of the lease is not of paramount importance. A guaranty in the bill that the municipalities and the State would have a prior right to the use of this power is at least of as much consequence to the municipalities and the State as the length of the term of the lease, and I trust that the amendment that I have offered will be adopted, because nowhere in this bill is there any provision giving to the State or subdivision thereof any privilege over that granted to public-service corporations, which is contrary to the policy adopted by all progressive countries that have enacted legislation covering this subject. Furthermore, if the amendment which I have proposed is agreed to, every State and subdivision thereof which desires to use the water power generated by any public dam will have a prior right to obtain the same over that of public-service corporations. It will also lighten the burden of the Secretary of War in awarding these leases by establishing a just and equitable rule of priority.

The authors of the pending measure have wisely provided in their bill that the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the use of such dams by grantees for power purposes, thus recognizing the principle of the priority of use and purpose as to navigation. The proposed amendment extends the principle of priority to public uses of the State, the municipal subdivisions thereof, and public institutions. If the State and the municipal subdivisions thereof are to be denied priority in the use of the water in navigable rivers over that of public-service corporations, then the State or its subdivisions may be denied the use of water for domestic purposes, which is an unheard-of doctrine and one to which the American people will never consent.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make a correction. I stated that the Secretary of War had not given authority for more than a 50-year term. On the Tennessee, at Hales Bar, the city of Chattanooga had a grant of use of water power for 99 years. At White, Ark., above Lock No. 3, J. A. Omberg, jr., has a grant for the use of water power for 99 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire) there were 30 ayes and 13 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That no works constructed, maintained, and operated under the provisions of this act shall be owned, trusteed, or controlled by any device or in any manner so that they may form a part of, or in any manner effect, a combination in the form of an unlawful trust or form the subject of an unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy, or the exercises of any other business contemplated: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful under the approval of the Secretary of War for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary, by supplementing the currents or power, and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, account ing therefor and paying therefor under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

In no case shall such an arrangement be permitted to raise the price, render unjust or unfair any practice, work, or discrimination, or operate in restraint of trade.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest an amendment in the first line of the section which I think the committee will be willing to accept. It is this: Page 16, line 10, after the word "no," insert the words "rights or privileges granted under this act and."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MOON). The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 10, after the word "no," insert the words "rights or privileges granted under this act and."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Ought not the gentleman to add the word "no" to his amendment?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes; I will modify the amendment by adding the word "no."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 10, after the word "no," insert the words "rights or privileges granted under this act and no."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the section a new paragraph, to read:

"If any grantee shall violate the provisions of this section he shall forfeit all rights and privileges conferred by this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment as a new section, to be inserted at this place, as section 16a. It does not seem to fit in with section 15. It is this:

Except upon the written consent of the Secretary of War, no sale or delivery of power shall be made to a distributing company.

Mr. ADAMSON. If that goes in at all, it ought to go into section 11.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to return to section 11.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to return to section 11 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I suggest that we finish the bill first. I do not know that I will object then to going back.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from New Hampshire was trying to offer an amendment to this section, and I suggested that, if it went in at all, it ought to go into section 11.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think it might go in in the place I offered it. I made the request to return to section 11 at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 11 add a new paragraph, to read as follows: "That, except upon the written consent of the Secretary of War, no sale or delivery of power shall be made to a distributing company."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to section 11 for the purpose of offering this amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a word about the amendment unless the gentleman from Georgia accepts the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the amendment. It is in accord with the general policy of the bill which is to convey tremendous power over the navigable streams of the country to the Secretary of War. I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that this measure furnishes an exception to the general policy of the Government in disposing of the public property. The general bridge act allows no bridge to be constructed over any navigable stream without the subject first being brought before Congress, and Congress itself knowing where and by whom it is proposed to have the bridge constructed and being afforded an opportunity to grant or to refuse to grant the necessary authority to construct that particular bridge. And the other day the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] secured the adoption of an amendment to the reclamation law by which hereafter the power to dispose of the millions coming from the sale of public lands is not to be exercised under the unlimited discretion of the Reclamation Bureau, but by which every reclamation project must be submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress and then to the Congress itself before any money for reclamation purposes can be expended. But here we propose to turn over two or three hundreds of millions of horsepower under a general law, and to turn the navigable streams, so far as the construction of dams and the selection of grantees are concerned, over to the unlimited discretion of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it is necessary under this bill that each project shall first go through Congress by a special act before the Secretary of War can approve of it.

Mr. COOPER. I had not so understood the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the law. There must be a special bill authorizing the Secretary of War to approve plans before it can be done, and this proposition relates only to the distribution of power and the regulation of the charges and practices after the dam is completed.

Mr. COOPER. I did not so understand the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not change that feature of the law at all. They will always have to bring in special bills.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, my colleague may have had in mind the proposed bill of the Secretary of War.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I know that there was a bill in which it was provided that exclusive power in the particulars I have mentioned should be given to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMSON. That was the Secretary's bill, but we did not adopt it in toto.

Mr. COOPER. Then I was in error. I had not understood that to be the case, not having been here when the bill was taken up. The print of this bill is such a difficult thing to read, there being the text of the bill, with some amendments in italics and some in brackets, that I had not observed that the original bill proposed by the Secretary of War had been changed in that particular. It is exceedingly significant that the Secretary of War should propose a bill for a general law to authorize him, in his discretion and without the previous knowledge of Congress, to permit dams to be built in the navigable streams of the country, wherever and by whomsoever he might see fit to have them built. No man ought to have such a power as that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that in the other bill about the public domain the absolute power and discretion are given to the Secretary of the Interior without any special act of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This brings to our attention the very thing that I tried to call to the attention of the committee in my amendment, and that is that it is necessary for the Secretary of War to have control over the regulation and services of electric current supplied to connecting companies. As a general rule, the lessee generates the power and sells it to subsidiary companies; and if the Secretary of War has not the power to regulate the service and charges of the subsidiary or connecting companies, in what way will the consumer be protected from an admitted monopoly?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this discussion, and I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], who seems to have taken a great deal of interest in this bill, if he does not consider that this is an unwise delegation of power to the Secretary of War, and would it not be the part of wisdom for Congress to establish a scale of charges rather than to give the Secretary of War the unlimited power to say what the prices shall be for the energy sold as developed by these water powers?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in the main I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE]. I believe that the power that you are placing in the hands of the Secretary of War in this bill is greater than he should have. I believe that it is placing a burden upon him that he is not fitted to carry. We had an illustration here yesterday of what war is, and how necessary the Secretary of War is in war times. This legislation is to take care of matters in times of peace.

It is the industry and commerce of this country that we are legislating for, and I heartily agree that we should at this time provide a commission that will, at least, rise to the dignity of a commission that can handle such a vast proposition. It is unwise to build up in the War Department a bureau that is unnecessary when we have other departments of our Government that are now equipped to handle the matter, in a partial way at least, though probably not the best.

But to get back to the original proposition, and that is that in any bill you pass at this time if you are going to have regulation that amounts to anything you have to have it extend to subsidiary and connecting companies. Furthermore, the amendment that is offered simply requires the consent of the Secretary of War to the sale to subsidiary companies. It is of more value to the consumer than the present section. If you are going to amend this section, why not adopt a provision that will extend effective regulation over service and charges to the connecting or subsidiary company? I am glad that the gentleman from New Hampshire has seen the necessity for amending the committee bill in this respect.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by adding at the end the words "except in case of an emergency."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by adding at the end of it the words "except in case of an emergency."

The question was taken, and the amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all of the provisions in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 11, and 15 of this act fixing conditions of the consent of Congress and regulating practices and charges between the grantees and their customers for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams in the navigable waters of the United States shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or previously authorized in the navigable waters of the United States in which the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers are required, as well as to new projects in the navigable waters of the United States for which the consent of Congress may hereafter be granted, in the construction, maintenance, and operation of which the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers shall be required. All conflicting provisions contained in any previous act of Congress granting consent for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any dam in the navigable waters of the United States in the construction, maintenance, and operation of which the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers were required are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are so altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all the conditions and provisions in said sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 11, and 15 of this act.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if any companies are now operating under a perpetual franchise?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand some are.

Mr. RAINEY. Is it the intention of the committee to reach these perpetual franchises and limit them so that they will run only for 50 years?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my desire. In effect it is first to put a tax on each, which we have done, and make the old ones pay as well as the new, and then to put the conditions, regulations, and requirements upon the old ones as well as the new. As to the 50-year proposition, whether it can be done or not I do not know. I doubt if you can, but I do not know.

Mr. RAINEY. This section makes it applicable to existing projects?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will let me answer just a little further.

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I felt like if we were going to put strict regulations which would reach to the new ones they ought to relate back to the old ones in granting consent to whom we had reserved that right, and that in fixing conditions under which they should build and operate those conditions ought to relate to the old ones, and if the public in any locality could be protected in the same way the same burden should be put upon all alike, the old and the new. As to the 50-year proposition I leave that to the gentleman.

Mr. RAINEY. That being the intention of the committee, I would like to call attention to the fact that this section of this bill only makes it applicable to provisions in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 11, and 15 of this act.

Mr. ADAMSON. If there is any other section that ought to be put in there, it is all right.

Mr. RAINEY. The only other sections reaching the Keokuk Dam and these perpetual franchises, and making it 50 years instead of 10,000 years, are sections 9 and 10.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing to say that all of the provisions of this bill shall apply, if practicable.

Mr. RAINEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment: After the word "five," in line 21, page 17, insert the words "nine and ten," and after the word "five," in line 19, page 18, insert the words "nine and ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "five," in line 21, page 17, insert the words "nine and ten," and after the word "five," in line 19, page 18, insert the words "nine and ten."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The original section 17 of this bill as presented and reported by the committee was so far-reaching I took occasion to go into the matter, and desire to insert in the RECORD at this time what a far-reaching effect it would have had upon the legislation of the country had it been adopted. The present amended section 17, which has been substituted by the committee, practically relieves those embarrassing conditions. I feel that I ought to call the attention of the committee to the fact and show how sometimes we override past legislation and do not fully consider the repealing clauses of bills. Much consideration was given to the new section 17, which was substituted for the original section 17, as it was first reported to the House. The amendments will remove all danger of its repealing or affecting the acts of Congress relating to the public lands under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture as well as those special acts of Congress, such as the Hetch Hetchy bill and others of like import.

The following acts would have been repealed or materially modified, which would have been most injurious, namely:

ACTS OF CONGRESS WHICH MIGHT HAVE BEEN REPEALED OR DIRECTLY OR INDIRECTLY AFFECTED BY HOUSE BILL 16053, SECTION 17, IF THE SAME HAD NOT BEEN AMENDED.

The act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 1095), amended by act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stat., 404), an act authorizing grants for irrigation reservoirs, etc., on public lands and reservations.

The act of February 15, 1901 (31 Stat., 790), authorizing use of public lands for electrical plants, dams, etc.

The act of February 1, 1905 (33 Stat., 628), authorizing grants for dams and reservoirs in forest reserves for municipal or mining purposes.

The Federal reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Sections 2339 and 2340 of the Revised Statutes.

The grant to the city of Los Angeles (34 Stat., 801).

The grant to the city of San Francisco, act of December 19, 1913.

The grant to the Edison Electric Co. (34 Stat., 163).

Various other private grants to cities, corporations, and individuals authorizing the occupation of public lands by dams and reservoirs for irrigation and power purposes.

So far as it relates to dams and navigable waters, the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat., 1150–1152).

The general dam act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat., 386), reenacted June 23, 1910 (36 Stat., 593).

Numerous special acts by which Congress authorized the construction of dams in navigable waters.

It is happy indeed that the committee have changed this section 17 and put it in the shape now so as not to repeal these various acts and others not referred to.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman and others say this act would be repealed and all of these other acts?

Mr. RAKER. Well, the language of this section reads as follows:

SEC. 17. That all provisions in this act contained fixing conditions upon which the consent of Congress is granted for the construction of dams shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized as well as to new projects to which the consent of Congress may hereafter be granted. All conflicting provisions contained in any act of Congress granting consent to the construction of any dam are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are so altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all of the conditions and provisions incorporated in this act.

It is a general sweeping statement that all of these authorizations would be repealed. Now every private dam, every act granting a private individual the right to dam up any waters of a stream, would be repealed; and if the contention is correct that the Secretary of War should have power to follow up every stream to its source, saying that the water coming down from that may be used for the purpose of navigation, there would not be a private dam or an irrigator or otherwise upon the public domain or any branch of those streams that would not be affected by the bill, and I am satisfied that the committee did not intend it that way, because their subsequent amendment, after the situation was called to their attention, shows it, and they have happily left the law upon the subject as it now exists and provided that these laws are not affected. This is as it should be.

We of the West were much interested in this legislation, and we were well pleased when the committee having the bill in charge consented to the amendments suggested to section 17. We could not afford to leave any doubt as to its effect on the Hetch Hetchy bill and the other acts of Congress, which I have just read, and the law relating to the use of public lands upon which dams, ditches, canals, and so forth could be built and used in general irrigation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know who had this nightmare, but whoever it was had eaten a bad kind of pie.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MANN. If it be true, however, that the provision inserted, which the gentleman refers to, is necessary, then under the existing law these dams which have been constructed have been constructed in violation of law, because existing law is in practically the same language as in this law as to the cases to which they are applied. There is no distinction. This bill under its terms applies only to those cases where the consent of Congress is required for the construction of dams across navigable waters of the United States. That is in the first section, and that is all there is to it, and that is in the existing law.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. While it may be a nightmare with some, I do not believe it is with a great majority.

Mr. MANN. Well, I did not yield for that. If the gentleman wants to say he has not the nightmare, that is all right. No man who has had a nightmare admits it when he feels good. The man who has the nightmare thinks it is reality. That is the trouble with the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. As joining in this nightmare I find the legal advisers of the Department of the Interior and the Geological Survey and other great departments of this Government agreeing with me in this matter.

Mr. MANN. I do not think they have any legal advisers in either of those departments. If they have, they never communicate with Congress. Of all the rotten bills that are ever sent from any department of the Government, the rottenest come from the Interior Department—form, substance, and everything else. The gentleman would not claim they had a lawyer up there. But if it is true, the gentlemen up there ought to examine the existing law, which has been on the statute books since 1906, and which controls the construction of dams in navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. RAKER. This does not say "navigable waters."

Mr. MANN. It does say "navigable waters." That is exactly what it says. That is the trouble with most of the gentlemen. They never read what it says. This is what it says:

SECTION 1. That when consent has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly, through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States, to any person to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purpose across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States—

And the bill does not apply to anything at all except those cases, 14 of them, where the Government has constructed other works and leases its power. It is purely a case of nightmare. The Interior Department attorney needs to take some pills.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman is satisfied with the section as it is now.

Mr. RAKER. I am.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then why do you want to debate it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wait until the next section is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States, nor grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes, heretofore directly authorized by Congress or indirectly authorized through some department or official of the Government of the United States.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FERRIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is recognized.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 18, line 25, beginning with the word "hereafter," the rest of that section. And before that is voted on I want to say that this section was fixed up at my own request and through the generosity of the chairman of the committee. But the department now feels that those words have a limiting effect that ought not to be in the bill, and the chairman has very kindly consented to modify it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I accepted the whole section against my judgment, because the gentleman requested it. If he wants to withdraw part of it, it is satisfactory to me.

Mr. FERRIS. The chairman is correct about it. The chairman has been doubly generous to me. I owe him a debt of gratitude as well as affection. I gladly acknowledge it. This all came up through fear of repealing some acts that no one intended to repeal.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I would like to know what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 25, after the word "purposes," strike out the remainder of the section, which reads as follows:

"Heretofore directly authorized by Congress or indirectly authorized through some department or official of the Government of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in response to what was said before——

Mr. ADAMSON. I have accepted the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I know you have, but I want a few moments. Section 18 is directly in line with what I stated, which the committee has placed here in the bill by this new section, to obviate and relieve and put in condition the very things referred to, namely:

That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States, nor grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes.

That of itself shows there must have been a great many of us who had "nightmare." If nightmare brings results, brings proper legislation, prevents the repealing of good laws, and maintains upon the statute books that which ought to be and takes off that which ought to be taken off, it is a good thing to have that kind of a nightmare. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, has given much thought to this subject, and has given much thought to the same subject in regard to the bill before the Committee on the Public Lands. I have joined in this work with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. And I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the committee had during all of its hearings, and whenever it was necessary, good, competent assistance from the Department of the Interior. We had competent assistance from able lawyers from the Department of the Interior, who, we believe, understand the land laws and who have had wide experience in these matters. And they gave us splendid assistance and they have assisted in bringing about this splendid result.

The section under consideration as originally presented read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all provisions in this act contained fixing conditions upon which the consent of Congress is granted for the construction of dams shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized, as well as to new projects to which the consent of Congress may hereafter be granted. All conflicting provisions contained in any act of Congress granting consent to the construction of any dam are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are so altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all of the conditions and provisions incorporated in this act.

The section and a new section 18 as amended will read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all of the provisions in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 11, and 15 of this act, fixing conditions of the consent of Congress and regulating practices and charges between the grantees and their customers for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams in the navigable waters of the United States shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or previously authorized in the navigable waters of the United States in which the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers are required, as well as to new projects in the navigable waters of the United States for which the consent of Congress may hereafter be granted, in the construction, maintenance, and operation of which the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers shall be required. All conflicting provisions contained in any previous act of Congress granting consent for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any dam in the navigable waters of the United States in the construction, maintenance, and operation of which the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers were required are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are so altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all the conditions and provisions in said sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 11, and 15 of this act.

SEC. 18. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams, or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes, or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the water-power bill from the Public Lands Committee comes before the House, I think probably the gentleman will have a better understanding as to the incapacity of some of the draftsmen of the bill. But I would like to ask what is the purpose of saying that Congress can not grant a franchise to a municipal corporation to construct a dam across navigable waters for the generation of electric power under the terms of this act?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not understand the question of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Why can we not pass a bill giving the city of Chattanooga, if there is such an opportunity, the right to construct a dam under this act?

Mr. ADAMSON. It was my pleasure to advise the gentleman in numerous conferences, but without effect, that Congress had the power to do that in any case where it chose.

Mr. MANN. You can not do that under this act.

Mr. ADAMSON. Congress can repeal it if it chooses.

Mr. MANN. Congress can repeal it, of course. Congress can repeal the whole thing.

Mr. ADAMSON. I assure the gentleman from Illinois that it has been placed in there for the purpose of——

Mr. MANN. It has not been placed in there yet. That is what I am trying to find out about. Who is it that wants to say we shall not have the power——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman refers to this section?

Mr. MANN. I refer to section 18.

Mr. ADAMSON. We assented to that for no reason on earth except that it might be a specific for the nightmare. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the nightmare.

Mr. FERRIS. We will talk about "nightmare" before we get through with this. The gentleman from Illinois has romped around here talking about that long enough.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry if I have offended the feelings of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has, and he has abused other Members, and he has abused himself by abusing the officials of the Interior Department. It is beneath the dignity of the gentleman to do it. The gentleman is one of the ablest Members of the House, and he should not have done it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman need not sugar coat it. The gentleman so often comes to me for help, which I give him, that I am perfectly willing to take a little scolding from the gentleman because he is trying to insert an absurd provision in the bill. Why not say Congress shall not have the power to grant a franchise to a municipal corporation to construct a dam under the provisions of this act?

Mr. FERRIS. When the gentleman is through I shall speak in my own time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to go back and take in this word now.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I naturally hesitate long even to assume a momentary quarrel with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. But the gentleman in two or three speeches here has, as I believe, without warrant assaulted the Interior Department and has assaulted the Members of the House, and asserted that those who had earnest and patriotic thoughts on the subject had the "nightmare," and asserted that it was "rot" and that it was "meaningless," "idiotic," and so forth, using such words as that.

Now, irrespective of what becomes of this bill or what becomes of this section or of this language, it ill becomes the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of a great party, to stand here and grow abusive to Members of the House who are not his equals in debate and who are his juniors in years and service and everything else; and the gentleman, when he gets up here and screams out "idiocy" and unworthiness and attributes unpatriotic motives to men in the executive departments, assaults men who have served longer in the departments than he has served in the House. The gentleman ought not to do it. He replies to me that he renders favors and help to me. The gentleman oftentimes does do that, and I am thankful to him for it. But that is beside the question as to whether he can come into the House and become abusive to Members and abusive to the departments, whose officials can not come here on this floor and defend themselves.

Now, on the question at issue—it was asserted that those who felt that the original section 17 repealed certain laws now on the statute book had the "nightmare" and knew nothing, and were nonentities in this House—let me read this section to the House and see who is right about this matter. I do not attribute any erroneous motives to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and I want to say that the members of that committee have been most generous and patriotic in trying to get a good bill, and they have been most considerate of those of us who, the gentleman has said, have the "nightmare"; and they have been most kind and courteous, so much so that they have endeared themselves to me and to others for all time.

But let us see who is right and who is wrong about this matter. Let us see who has the "nightmare." Section 17, on page 17, provides——

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the gentleman reading from now?

Mr. FERRIS. I am reading from the original bill. Section 17 provides—

SEC. 17. That all provisions in this act contained fixing conditions upon which the consent of Congress is granted for the construction of dams shall apply alike—

To what?—

to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized, as well as to new projects to which the consent of Congress may hereafter be granted—

No matter whether it is the consent of Congress as to a navigable stream or to unnavigable waters or anywhere else. I read further:

All conflicting provisions in any act of Congress granting consent to the construction of any dam—

And so forth. I call attention to the fact that 72 per cent of the water power of this country was developed by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior and lies west of the Mississippi River, and the gentleman from Illinois does not know anything about it. He is just floundering around in abuse. I read:

All conflicting provisions contained in any act of Congress granting consent to the construction of any dam are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are so altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all of the conditions and provisions incorporated in this act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts? Seventy-nine million dollars have been expended in irrigation west of the Mississippi River under the act of 1902, which is an authorization and a consent on the part of Congress, and every one of them would have been repealed by this original section 17.

No one wants to do that. The gentleman at the head of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ADAMSON], when I first went to him, told me that he did not want to do that. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the leader of the House, when I went to him, told me he did not want to do that; and they both thought then, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] thought, that we were mistaken.

But what are the facts? The gentleman from Illinois rails about the fact that this is a bill affecting the navigable waters. There is not a man in this House to-day who can define "navigable waters." The courts do not even know. We tried to define it, and grew weary of the task. The Secretary of War, in a conference that we had with him, asserted that in his opinion small streams flowing down the mountain side that you could step across are a part of and a link in the chain in navigable waters; and if his theory is correct, under this bill and the original section 17 they could go out and kick out every irrigation dam in the West and let cactus and sagebrush take the place of the alfalfa fields, which are now producing happy and prosperous homes.

Is that a "nightmare"? Is that foolish? Does that condemn the department that advocates it? No. We have grown accustomed to sitting here idle and cringing while the gentleman from Illinois flounders around and becomes abusive of men who are not his equals in debate.

The gentleman can stand there and abuse some Members, can stand there and abuse all Members, and get away with it, I suppose; but when he misstates the facts in connection with his abuse, I will reply to him both now and in the future, as long as we are both in the House.

Section 17 has been modified, and properly so. I call attention to the fact that the original section 17 would have repealed the Hetch Hetchy grant. That was given through the consent of Congress. That is on public land. That bill was passed almost by unanimous consent in the first session of this Congress. We do not want to do an idle thing or a silly thing. We do not want to go off on a tangent here.

Section 18 is necessary, and must remain.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] in reading section 17 did not read it to the House in order to furnish the information that is in the section.

Mr. FERRIS. I read it in toto, without a word missing.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not read it in toto. Here is the way he read it:

Shall apply to all existing enterprises in operation—

And so forth—

As well as to new projects—

And so forth.

I do not get it quite the way the gentleman said it, but that is substantially the way the gentleman said it.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MANN. What for?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Is not the gentleman from Illinois misunderstanding the gentleman from Oklahoma? As I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], he read the language that is stricken out in our bill, and not the language beginning on line 20.

Mr. FERRIS. That was the original section, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to read section 17.

Mr. FERRIS. The original section 17, before it was stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Oh, then that is all right. I have not compared that.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not see that it is necessary for Members to get excited over propositions before the House at this time. So far as I am individually concerned I am extremely happy, and I think my good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will feel the same way when they reflect for a moment, as they have both advocated an advanced position in water-power development. I remember, in the Sixty-second Congress some of us objected to bills that were upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar providing for the construction of dams. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], on February 7, 1911, demanded a second on a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill (No. 32219) granting to the Long Sault Development Co. the right to construct a dam in the St. Lawrence River.

This bill proposed to grant a franchise for 99 years, and without the necessary provisions to protect the interests of the public. That motion was defeated, 66 Members voting for and 84 against the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and it showed the first real test in Congress in favor of greater restrictions and provisions for building of these dams which would preserve the rights of the people. It has not been the policy of those who have advocated amendments to the general dam bill to impede development, but before granting these franchises we believe the rights of the people should be more thoroughly protected. These bills were at one time placed on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and some of them were originally passed in that way. In the Sixty-second Congress there were a number proposed and all were objected to at that time because no amendments would be accepted which some of us believed at that time were necessary to guard the interests of consumers. We believed that certain provisions ought to be put in the bills granting these franchises which were not in the original law of 1906 as amended by the act of 1910 providing for the construction of dams in navigable rivers. I realize that when the dam bill was passed which was proposed by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] it was probably the best bill that he was able to get through Congress at that time, and he did the best he could then to protect the rights of the people. This was not due to any lack of patriotism or devotion to the rights of the people, but because the great value of water power was not so well understood as now; but since the passage of that law the development of hydroelectric power has advanced very materially in the country, until now the bill that he proposed and had passed through Congress is not a bill that he would himself advocate at this time.

We go much further, and require more restrictions and reserve more rights to the people than would be possible under the original law. So, when this Congress has adopted many of the provisions that were advocated by some of us in the last Congress, I think my good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and others in this House who took part in the fight for those provisions ought to be happy now that Congress has come to believe, as we did then, that these provisions should be placed in the bill. So I am pleased to realize that some of these provisions which we have been fighting for in the last three Congresses have been adopted and are made a part of this bill. The other day I took down the papers which I had used in the last Congress, and in looking over those amendments which were then proposed but not accepted at that time I found they were in line with the amendments which have been placed in this bill. We are advancing; and when we grant a franchise for 50 years, which is a long time in this world, those who are here to-day will be gone before the expiration of those franchises, and the advancement of hydroelectric development will be so great that any man living to-day, if he could come back to the world, would be surprised at the advancement that will have been made. Who knows but in a few years, before the life of one of these franchises shall expire, all these plants that are producing hydroelectric power and transmitting it over the country may be lined up in such a way that they will be serving the people on a continuous line from San Francisco to New York. I believe that now is the time to protect the rights of the people and not wait until all the franchises are given away. I believe we have placed amendments upon this bill that will help to preserve those rights of the people for all time to come, and in the future they will be under the control of Congress.

It is an easy matter for gentlemen to cry we are advocating foolish conservation or that we are trying to prevent any development of water power. I care nothing for such argument. When we call to mind that so many of our natural resources have been given away, it is not to be wondered at that the people demand now that their representatives shall preserve these natural resources for future use. These water-power franchises are becoming more valuable each day. The developments are coming so fast that in a few years they may be a thousand times more valuable than now. It does not seem right that when that time does come all these valuable assets should be gone. I am for the development of the water power of the country, but I want to know that they are not going to be taken by those who will form a monopoly exclusively for their own benefit and combine against the rights of consumers. If we can not get development without surrendering our rights, then it is far better that we should wait than to hastily give away this valuable asset, which now belongs to all the people. Let no man be deceived about water power. There are persons in this country seeking to secure these franchises, knowing their great value now and that they must increase very materially in a few years to come. We gave away valuable timber and mineral lands, until to-day we realize the necessity of a proper conservation of the natural resources we have left. Let us not now begin this extravagant waste by giving away the water power of the country and let it fall into the hands of the few who may use it in such a way as to be a detriment to the people. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "States" in line 24, section 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 24, after the word "States," strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] suggests to me that this amendment will be too far-reaching, but I want to call attention to the fact that a part of this bill is made to apply especially to municipal corporations, and it is improper for us to bind up the country with a provision that no part of this section shall apply to a municipal corporation, when there ought to be no reason why municipalities can not apply for and obtain grants just such as the Hetch Hetchy grant. So I do not see why the same kind of a provision ought not to apply to those corporations.

Mr. FERRIS. Many little towns and cities in your country have come to Congress and secured grants for waterworks, power dams, and water rights, and you do not want to repeal those. You want to let them stand just as they are. You do not want to bring the water supply for a little town of 1,500 people under a bill that has to do with navigation and power. There is an adequate law to govern them, and to subject them to this law which is under the War Department will bring confusion. It is not desired by either of the departments or either of the parties in charge of the bill.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. In reply to what the gentleman has said, I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if these grants are not from either the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. FERRIS. Many of them are from Congress itself, and you do not want to repeal those acts. I am sure no one intends to have this law apply to the public lands and the water power or water rights on the nonnavigable streams. If the House will adopt my amendment it will come out all right. It is suggested by the department.

Mr. BRYAN. Recognizing the fact that we can not pass this amendment, I will withdraw it, but I call the matter to the attention of the committee. There ought to be an amendment to protect the matter of little corporations owning franchises of the kind to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire recognition?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to obtain some information on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado; he has been on his feet some time.

Mr. MANN. I hope the Chair next time will not put the question until he is ready for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado has been on his feet some time.

Mr. MANN. Then why does not the Chair recognize the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, the author of the bill, whether or not the provisions of section 18 are sufficiently broad to protect the vested rights of the irrigators of the West upon the nonnavigable streams under existing acts of Congress. I want to know whether the committee considers this section broad enough to cover and protect all the appropriations of water heretofore made in the arid States under the various irrigation and water-right acts of Congress?

Mr. ADAMSON. It was never the intention of the committee to interfere with any of the irrigation or reclamation acts or improvements or the disposition of public domain under the other two departments. Neither did we believe that any language in the bill would permit any such inference, but in a spirit of concession we desired to secure a good bill and to do what we desired we should do. We had a conference or consultation with anybody or everybody who would talk with us about it, and we have agreed to the language proposed to us by the Interior Department.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Then there is no intention on behalf of the committee of repealing or affecting vested water rights granted by Congress heretofore or acquired under existing laws? If this bill does not interfere with our western water rights, I will not offer any amendment to this section 18.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not propose to deal with anything except the navigable rivers of the country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I regard this amendment as very important. The bill down to section 18, all through it, is clearly confined to the construction of dams in navigable waters, not in waters relating to navigation, not in little streams on the mountain side, where there is no navigation, but it uses the language all through the bill down to section 18, "dams in navigable waters of the United States."

Now comes section 18, and while it is caused by the nightmare I have referred to, I have no objection to that part of it which makes it clear to anyone that it is not intended to apply to the Forestry Service or the public domain under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. If under the bill they obtain the right to develop hydroelectric power and the water becomes short by the dryness of the season, would not the Government or lessee be permitted to go up stream and tear out all the dams, unless these rights were protected?

Mr. MANN. They would not have the right under this bill. There is not a line in here on that subject. Now, let us see what the proposition is which gentlemen have got the committee to agree to. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, and so forth, nor grants to municipal corporations for use of water power or water power for municipal purposes.

Here is a declaration in this bill that this act shall not apply to water power for municipal purposes. Well, we have inserted in half a dozen places, more or less, in the bill a provision or provisions designed to give some preference to municipalities, and then skillfully somebody has inserted this joker in the bill that the bill shall not apply to water power for municipal purposes. We provide a law for the construction of a dam, and when the water power is developed it is to be sold for municipal purposes, while it can not be sold under this language for municipal purposes; if you do, the bill is no longer applicable to the project.

Now, I do not know what wild gentleman—I assume it was not the gentleman from Oklahoma, unless he was in his present temperament—but somebody with a nightmare drew this provision, or else it was designedly inserted as a malicious joker to prevent the use of power for municipal purposes, or to take out from under the operation of the act dams that are used for municipal power.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 20 ayes and 37 noes.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BRYAN and Mr. ADAMSON.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 36 ayes and 36 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. I think the amendment which we have just adopted leaves this section in an unfortunate situation. I think the words "nor grant to municipal corporations for use of water power or water power for municipal purposes" should be transposed to line 21, after the word "dam." Otherwise we have excepted from the provisions of this act any grant to a municipal corporation for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes, although the bill itself in other sections regulates and governs it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's side of the House just voted that way.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I think with that transposition it will be all right. I move to amend by transposing the words.

Mr. ADAMSON. The provision written by the Secretary of the Interior and accepted by us in conformity to the scheme of the bill is that it should not interfere with irrigation-power dams or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture nor to the municipal corporations for use of water power or water power for municipal purposes. This bill does not contemplate any such grant. This bill contemplates and relates solely to obstructions in navigable streams for navigation purposes. I think the amendment is not required. Congress can deal with it just as it chooses.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose this stays in the law, then will it not be impossible by merely granting an act and passing a law to enable some company to bring it under the provisions of this act?

Mr. ADAMSON. It never could be done in accordance with the provisions of this act for water-power purposes. It could be done for the improvement of navigation in navigable streams. Congress could pass a special law for any purpose, but this merely provides that the provisions of this bill shall not apply.

Mr. MANN. When we grant permission to build a dam across a stream, it is for water-power purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Our purpose is for navigation. If the company thinks it can make it pay for water-power purposes, we are glad to have it do it in that way.

Mr. MANN. Let us assume a case that exists in many instances throughout the United States, where there is no navigation and can not be at some stretch of a river which is called a navigable river, both above and below. Does the gentleman mean to say that we have not the power in a case of that kind?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think this bill ought to apply to any such case as that.

Mr. MANN. But it does apply to it.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not our intention.

Mr. MANN. And if it does apply to it, should we not make it apply to a grant to a municipal corporation?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Why, we have tried all through the bill to give preference to municipal corporations until we come to the end, and then we say that it shall not apply to them.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that the case suggested by the gentleman would be a mere subterfuge. I think in good faith this bill ought to be invoked only for the promotion of navigation.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of inserting this provision in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have told the gentleman that I did not put any of that section in the bill.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly evident what it was put in for. This provision in connection with what is stricken out was originally put in the bill to be sure that it did not affect Hetch Hetchy.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was a disclaimer on our part.

Mr. MANN. We have already stricken that part of it out, and what is the use of leaving the other in, and leaving it a matter of absolute declaration that where we endeavor to give preference to municipal power we insert in the bill the provision that it shall not apply to municipal power?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I think this inconsistency can be easily removed by merely transposing the words "nor grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes" to the twenty-first line, on page 18, to be inserted after the word "dams," and I offer that as an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That would make it so that this power would apply to permits to be granted by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior unless they were for municipal purposes, and no one wants to do that. The only way to do is to strike it out of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I understand this bill has nothing to do with the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. But if we put an exception in the bill that it shall only apply to certain things, the inference would be that it applied to others.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me to read it as it will be amended by the proposed amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, I think the gentleman from Illinois will see that he is in error. As amended it would read:

That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams nor grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes, or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States—

And so forth. That makes it perfectly clear.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what good that does. You first provide that it shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ADAMSON. It puts the grants to municipal corporations on the same basis as grants on the public domain, where this bill will not touch them at all. That is the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Changing the form in that respect will not make any difference.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it means that now, but it will be clearer as the gentleman proposes to amend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 21, after the word "dams," insert the words "nor grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes," and in lines 24 and 25, page 18, strike out the words "nor grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power or water power for municipal purposes."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the second word "power" in line 25 is not there inadvertently?

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I have not offered any amendment, but I would offer an amendment to strike out the word "power" in line 25.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not. I did not write this section. I simply agreed to accept it, but the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Then I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have another modification. Ought the word in line 24, page 18, as read by the Clerk, to be "or" or "nor"?

Mr. ADAMSON. It ought to be "or."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It ought to be changed to "or." I would also suggest, if I might, the word "for" in reference to grants to municipal corporations for the use of water power, might be better changed to the word "affecting." Some of these grants issued have not been directly issued for water or water power, but they have been incident to such grants, and I would move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "for" and inserting the word "affecting."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 24, after the word "corporations," strike out the word "for" and insert the word "affecting."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California object to agreeing to the modification of this amendment?

Mr. MANN. I shall object to agreeing to any amendment. Let us have a vote on these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair meant modification.

Mr. MANN. This is not a modification. We just agreed to one on the theory it was a modification where it was an original amendment to the text.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Is this subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a motion to strike out one word.

Mr. RAKER. I thought we had already disposed of that.

The HAIRMAN. The Chair asked, "Is there objection?" and the gentleman from California addressed the Chair, and the Chair supposed he wanted to object. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the amendment just voted upon was practically the amendment I offered.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No; the gentleman's amendment was an amendment to transpose the language. My amendment changed the language.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Was the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire ever reported?

The CHAIRMAN. It was reported. The Clerk advises the Chair that he reported the amendment. The Chair remembers asking him to report it.

Mr. MANN. He did not report it, and the other two amendments agreed to had nothing to do with that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers distinctly that the Clerk did read the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Is it permissible to have this amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire will be again reported.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, before it is reported, I ask unanimous consent that the section as amended by the gentleman from Illinois be read, so we may know what change his amendment makes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will read the section as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 21, after the word "dams," transpose the language in lines 24 and 25, which reads as follows: "or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes," so that the section as it is proposed to be amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes or other projects under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be recognized?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am trying to persuade the gentleman from California that is all right according to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Just one moment. I want to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand now, this would not affect a grant by Congress to a municipality for water power.

Mr. ADAMSON. It will not now, and never would, if this had not been put in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] have another amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent to return to section 15 for a moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. For what purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. To offer two slight amendments.

Mr. ADAMSON. What are they?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. To add to line 19, after the word "approval," the word "regulation." It reads now "Provided, however——"

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama demands the regular order. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to section 15 for the purpose of offering two amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Are the words in lines 24 and 25, page 18, eliminated now from the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. They have been transposed in order to put them in the public domain without doubt.

Mr. COOPER. They are in the bill in another place and are eliminated at that place.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 6 for the purpose of making the correction to which I called the attention of the chairman of the committee a while ago.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman did call my attention to the fact that we agreed on the words "has been"——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I would like to call attention to the fact that in the last line on page 6 the words "has been" have been substituted for the word "would," but the word "be" was not taken out.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is exactly what I was about to say. We agreed on the words "has been" instead of the word "would." "Has been be" is not good grammar. I want to strike out the word "be." It has no business there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a clerical error. It is not an error of the House. It is in line 25, at the bottom of page 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and had directed him to report it back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is only one amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, whatever they are I want to agree to them.

Mr. MANN. Let us have it straight, so that we may know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the bill and the amendments——

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. While it is true that the committee rose, I suppose the Speaker has to take the action of the chairman of the committee who reported this bill back——

The SPEAKER. It is true there is a substitute.

Mr. MANN. With some kind of an amendment. It is also true that this bill was never read through in the Committee of the Whole, and the parliamentary inquiry is whether the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is authorized, when it has read only one section of the bill, to report the bill back without reading the balance of it?

Mr. ADAMSON. The House, by unanimous consent, addressed all motions and discussions to the substitute, and the substitute was read in detail and perfected. Now, of course, the first question will be whether the substitute shall be adopted in lieu of the original.

Mr. MANN. I am not particular about it. Of course there is no doubt that the committee did not have authority. It is also true that by unanimous consent——

Mr. ADAMSON. They did it.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman offered a substitute at the end of the reading of the first section, and the only unanimous-consent agreement about it was, so far as reading it for amendment was concerned, that it should be read as an original bill. But there was only one amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all. I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have first got to adopt the substitute and then pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is really the substitute that is being acted on.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5073) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RELIEF FOR UNITED STATES CITIZENS IN EUROPE (H. DOC. NO. 1137).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

After further consideration of the existing condition in Europe in so far as it is affecting citizens of the United States who are there without means, financial or otherwise, to return to their homes in this country, it seems incumbent upon the Government to take steps at once to provide adequate means by the chartering of vessels or otherwise of bringing Americans out of the disturbed region and conveying them to their homes in the United States. Moreover, in view of the difficulty of obtaining money upon letters of credit, with which most Americans abroad are supplied, it will be necessary to send agents abroad with funds which can be advanced on such evidences of credit, or used for the assistance of destitute citizens of the United States.

In these circumstances I recommend the immediate passage by the Congress of an act appropriating $2,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed at the disposal of the President, for the relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens and for personal services, rent, and other expenses which may be incurred in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, connected with, or growing out of, the existing disturbance in Europe.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 4, 1914.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "be" in line 25, page 6 of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. That was done in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No; there was an objection made to it.

Mr. ADAMSON. That was a clerical error.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] asks unanimous consent to strike out the word "be"——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Instead of "would be" we tried to substitute "has been" and they put "has been be" all there, I think. I want to strike out the word "be" and leave it "has been."

The SPEAKER. It seems to have been done, but the Clerk will read.

Mr. ADAMSON. I know it was done, but the gentleman from Illinois told me the Clerk did not have it that way.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amended portion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 25, reads as follows: "Engineers shall determine that navigation has been injured."

Mr. MANN. It is all right.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can a separate vote be asked for on any amendment now?

The SPEAKER. There is only one amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask whether we lost the right to a separate vote on an amendment by the substitution of this bill for the original bill?

The bill, as I understand it, Mr. Speaker, is reported by the committee as a substitute bill, by unanimous consent, in lieu of the original bill. Now, do we lose the right under that procedure of asking for a separate vote on any amendment that has been adopted?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker will pardon me, it was not done by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], in Committee of the Whole, when the first section of the bill was read, offered a substitute for the entire bill and gave notice that when the rest of the sections were read he would move to strike them out. Now the committee has reported back one substitute. There is only one amendment in the House.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair was going to hold. As far as the House is concerned, it comes back in the shape of one amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether a Member loses the right to ask for a separate vote by the fact that it does come back in the form of one amendment, in that it has been substituted for the original report of the committee? If the committee bill was under consideration, then, as I understand it, a Member would have the right, would he not, to ask for a separate vote?

The SPEAKER. It was offered all as one amendment to the first paragraph of this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then we lose the right that I am asking about?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DONOHOE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. DONOHOE. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. DONOHOE. Have we the right to offer a substitute to this substitute?

The SPEAKER. You can offer a substitute in the nature of a motion to recommit. After the third reading is the time for offering that. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have any suggestion to make? He had the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. He got what he wanted, as usual. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Are there any gentlemen on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who want to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. ADAMSON. Not that I am aware of.

The SPEAKER. If there is any gentleman on that committee who wants to make the motion to recommit, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I am not on the committee, but I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to see it changed. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOHOE rose.

The SPEAKER. What has the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say?

Mr. DONOHOE. I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. DONOHOE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] has a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Minnesota opposed to the bill?

Mr. MANN. He is. He has been fighting it all the way through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not recognized anybody, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] rose apparently to make a parliamentary inquiry to find out when to offer his motion.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand whether the Speaker heard the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard all three of them.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing, in order to accommodate the matter, to let all three combine.

Mr. MANN. When a gentleman on this side of the House is opposed to the bill, I think he is entitled to recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] ought to be recognized to offer a motion to recommit. The Clerk will report the gentleman's motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota moves to recommit the bill H. R. 16053 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to the committee to report the bill forthwith to the House with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 23, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SECTION 1. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Commerce shall constitute the water-power commission of the United States and hereby are authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act. The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise and regulate the development, generation, transmission, sale, and use of hydro-electric power developed under any grant or lease hitherto given by Congress, or any grant, lease, or permit issued under the provisions of this act, for the construction and use of dams across the navigable waters of the United States.

"'SEC. 2. That the consent of Congress is hereby given to any State, municipal subdivision thereof, or to any industrial or public-service corporation, association, or agency organized under and subject to the laws of such State, after obtaining the permit of the commission as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams and accessory works for water power or other purposes across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States; and such grantee and such permit shall at all times be subject to the provisions of this act, and also subject to such conditions as the commission under the provisions hereof shall make a part of such permit.

"'SEC. 3. As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder, the commission shall have due regard to the use and purpose for which such permit is required, priority of purpose and of benefits conferred by such permit and project to rank in the following order:

"'First. Benefits to navigation and conservation of water resources.

"'Second. Public uses of the State, the municipal subdivisions thereof, and public institutions.

"Third. Industrial use for agricultural, mining, and manufacturing industries.

"'Fourth. Commercial power for sale, barter, and exchange, and for use by public-service corporations.

"'SEC. 4. That the navigable waters of the United States subject to the provisions of this act are declared to be, and are, the streams, lakes, harbors, and connecting waterways which Congress heretofore has declared or may hereafter declare to be navigable waters or possess navigable capacity.

"'SEC 5. That the commission is hereby authorized and empowered under such terms, conditions, and general regulations as it may prescribe, consistent with the provisions of this act, to grant a permit to any State, municipal subdivision thereof, or persons organized under the laws thereof, as provided in section 2 hereof, for a period of not longer than 50 years, to construct, maintain, and operate dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary and convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

"'SEC. 6. That when such permit granted by the commission to such grantee to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purpose across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, such dam shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and after such approval it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of such plans or specifications has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War.

"'SEC. 7. That as a part of such permit such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the commission may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or maintaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate in connection therewith, without expense to the United States, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Chief of Engineers or the commission then may deem necessary in the interests of navigation, in accordance with plans made a part of such approval; and also that in case such facilities of navigation shall not be made a part of such original approval and construction, whenever the commission shall deem such facilities necessary, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power or power generated from water power for building and operating such constructions, and in such original approval, at the discretion of the commission, may be required to maintain and operate such lock without expense to the United States.

"'SEC. 8. That as a part of said permit the commission shall require that the plans, specifications, and location for any dam shall be such as shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize, in the interests of navigation and water-power development, the water resources of the region.

"'SEC. 9. That as a part of the conditions and stipulations such permit shall provide—

"'(a) For reimbursement to the United States of all expenses incurred by the United States with reference to the project, including the cost of any investigation necessary for the approval of the plans as heretofore provided, and for such supervision of construction as may be necessary in the interest of the United States.

"'(b) For the payment to the United States of reasonable charges for the benefits which may accrue to such project through the construction, operation, and maintenance by the United States of headwater improvements, including storage reservoirs, on any such stream, such charges to be fixed from time to time by the commission and to be based upon a reasonable compensation equitably apportioned among the grantee and others similarly situated upon the same stream receiving benefits by reason of increase of flow past their water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvements, the total charges to all such beneficiaries from any such headwater improvement not to exceed in any one year an amount equal to 5 per cent of the total investment cost, in addition to the necessary annual expense of the operation of such headwater improvement.

"'(c) That in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and accessory works there may be occupied and used such lands of the United States as may be necessary therefor, and in consideration thereof the owner of such dam shall pay to the United States such charges, not to exceed an annual payment of 5 per cent of the fair value of such lands, as may be fixed by the commission, and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing thereby to the interests of navigation as well as to the business of such grantee.

"'(d) For the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the commission may deem reasonable and just substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval, whenever the commission shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory works.

"'SEC. 10. That the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with any such dam, whether at the expense of such grantee or of the United States, shall at all times be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by any such dam, as shall be made by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, and in the use and operation of such navigation facilities the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the uses of such dam by such grantee for power purposes. Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and such fishways as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, and for failure to comply with any such rule or regulation such grantee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not less than $500 for each month's default, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed or provided by law.

"'SEC. 11. That the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise.

"'SEC. 12. That any grantee who shall fail or refuse to comply with the lawful order of the commission, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and every month such grantee shall remain in default shall be deemed a new offense and subject such grantee to additional penalties therefor; and in addition to said penalties the Attorney General may, on request of the commission, institute proper proceedings in the district court of the United States in the district in which such structure or any of its accessory works may, in whole or in part, exist, for the purpose of having such violation stopped by injunction, mandamus, or other process; and any such district court shall have jurisdiction over all such proceedings and shall have the power to make and enforce all writs, orders, and decrees necessary to compel the compliance with the requirements of this act and the lawful orders of the commission and the performance of any condition or stipulation imposed under the provisions of this act; and if the unlawful maintenance and operation are shown to be such as shall require a revocation of all rights and privileges held under authority of this act, the court may decree such revocation. In case of such a decree, the court may wind up the business of such grantee conducted under the rights in question, and may decree the sale of the dam and all appurtenant property constructed or acquired under authority of this act, and may declare such dam and accessory works to be an unreasonable obstruction to navigation and cause their removal at the expense of the grantee owning or controlling the same, except when the United States has been previously reimbursed for such removal, or may provide for the sale of the dam and all accessory and appurtenant works constructed under authority of this act for the further development of water power, and may make and enforce such other and further orders and decrees as equity demands; and in case of such a sale for the further development of water power the vendee shall take the rights and privileges and shall perform the duties which belonged to the previous grantee, and shall assume such outstanding obligations and liabilities arising out of the maintenance and operation of said dam and accessory works for power purposes as the court may deem equitable in the premises.

"'SEC. 13. That no property or project installed and operated under the provisions or benefits of this act shall be assigned or transferred except upon the written consent and under conditions specified by the commission, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the purpose of financing the business of such owner, and any successor or assign of such property or project, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original owner hereunder.

"'SEC. 14. That the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of not longer than 50 years from and after the date of the completion of the structure described in the original approval, and after the expiration of said period such rights shall continue until compensation has been made to said grantee for the fair value of its property, as hereinafter provided.

"'SEC. 15. That at any time after the expiration of said period the commission may terminate the rights hereby granted upon giving to the owners thereof one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States, or by any person authorized by the commission, of all of the property dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereby granted, which shall include all necessary and appurtenant property created or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and all other property the value and usefulness of which would be destroyed or seriously impaired by such termination, and upon paying the fair value of said property together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States and assuming all contracts entered into prior to the receipt by it of said notice of termination which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof, or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances existing at the time such contracts were made. The fair value of said property and the reasonableness and good faith of such contracts shall be determined by agreement between the commission and the owners of such property, and in the event of their failure to agree, then by proceedings instituted by the United States, or by any person authorized by Congress, in the district court of the United States within which any portion of such dam may be located. In the determination of the value of said property upon the termination of said grant as above provided no value shall be claimed by or allowed for the consent hereby granted, nor for good will, profit in pending contracts, nor other conditions of current or prospective business, and it is further provided that lands, rights of way, and interests therein shall be valued on the basis of actual cost.

"'SEC. 16. That all charges, rates, and service by any grantee or lessee hereunder, or connecting company engaged in the transmission and sale of power and electric current generated by any project subject to the provisions of this act, shall be reasonable, adequate, without discrimination, and subject to the regulations of the commission. To enforce such just and reasonable and no discriminatory charges and secure adequate and efficient service to consumers, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe and examine reports and systems of account, books, and other records, establish standards and make tests of service, control the issuance of stocks and bonds by corporations engaged in the generation, transmission, or sale of such hydroelectric product, and require them to submit statements of all costs of property, production, distribution, sale, and use of product, subject to such grant or lease and connected with such project, furnishing such information upon oath or by witness or in such form and upon such blanks as the commission may order and require; and on complaint of any State, municipality, or consumers affected thereby, and full hearing thereon, the commission is empowered to determine and prescribe the maximum rates to be charged, based on fair and reasonable returns on the valuation of the property and cost of operation, and ascertain and order the requirements of service to be rendered; and in case of any violation of such orders of the commission, or the refusal of such grantee or lessee to give the commission and its agents full access to its property and records, the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply. It is herewith provided, however:

"'(a) That when a State in which such water power and electric current is used shall notify the commission of the passage of laws and the perfecting of administration to effectively provide for such regulation of rates, charges, and service within such State and its municipal subdivisions, the regulations of the commission shall not apply to local and intrastate business therein.

"'(b) That when the power generated by such project enters both interstate and intrastate commerce, the commission is hereby authorized to join with any State in which such power is used in effecting such joint and interlocking system of Federal and State regulation as in its judgment shall most effectively promote the general public interest and carry out the purposes of this act.

"'(c) That in such valuation for rate-making purposes of the property operated under such grant there may be considered by the commission any lock or other aid to navigation, including all capital expenditures required of the grantee by the United States, but no value shall be allowed for the good will or franchise value of the lease or permit hereby or heretofore granted.

"'SEC. 17. That the grantee shall commence the construction of the dam and accessory works within one year from the date of the approval herein provided, and shall thereafter, in good faith and with due diligence, prosecute such construction, and shall, within the further term of three years, complete and put in commercial operation such part of the ultimate development as the commission shall deem necessary to supply the reasonable needs of the then available market, and shall, from time to time thereafter, construct such portion of the balance of such ultimate development as said commission may direct and within the time specified by said commission so as to supply adequately the reasonable market demands until such ultimate development shall be completed; and extensions of the periods herein specified, not to exceed two years, may be granted by the commission, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, when, in his judgment, the public interest will be promoted thereby. In case the grantee shall not commence actual construction within the time herein prescribed, or as extended by the commission, then the authority as to such grantee shall terminate, and in case any dam and accessory works be not completed within the time herein specified or extended as herein provided, then the Attorney General, upon the request of the commission, shall institute proper proceedings in the proper district court of the United States for the revocation of said authority, the sale of the works constructed, and such other equitable relief as the case may demand, as provided for in section 13 of this act.

"'SEC. 18. That the commission may lease to any applicant embraced in section 2 hereof, who has complied with the laws of the State in which the dam is constructed or to be constructed by the United States, the right to develop power from the surplus water over and above that required for navigation at any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed, either with or without contribution by the applicant, and owned by the United States, and on such terms as may be deemed by the commission for the best interests of the United States, and in awarding such lease preference shall be given to the applicant whose plans are deemed by the commission best adapted to conserve the public interest as provided in section 3 hereof, and all such leases and the parties thereto and the terms and conditions thereof shall be subject to the control and regulations of the commission under the general provisions of this act.

"'SEC. 19. That no works constructed, maintained, and operated under the provisions of this act shall be owned, trusteed, or controlled by any device or in any manner so that they may form a part of, or in any manner effect, a combination in the form of an unlawful trust or form the subject of an unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy, or the exercises of any other business contemplated: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful under the approval and regulations of the commission for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents to enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, accounting therefor and paying therefor under regulations to be prescribed by the commission.

"'In no case shall such an arrangement be permitted to raise the price, render unjust or unfair any practice, work, or discrimination, or operate in restraint of trade.

"'SEC. 20. That the word "persons" as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and the plural, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations, or other grantees. The word "dam" as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and plural, as the case demands.

"'SEC. 21 That all the provisions of this act for regulating the construction and use of dams and the transmission, sale, and use of power developed thereby shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized, as well as to new projects to which the consent of the commission may hereafter be granted. It is likewise provided that holders of previous authorizations are entitled to receive on application to the commission new permits subject to the provisions of this act and subject further to such terms and conditions as the commission shall deem just and reasonable in the premises and for the best protection of the public interests.

"'SEC. 22. For carrying out the provisions of this act the commission shall have authority to appoint a secretary and employ such experts, assistants, and other employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, and provide for the compensation and expenses of the same and the necessary office supplies from such sum as shall be provided by law.'"

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment? I have but one small amendment to offer to the motion to recommit.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can I withhold my motion for the previous question for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] to offer his amendment without losing my right to press my motion?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the gentleman can withhold it for that purpose.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOHOE. What has become of that substitute of mine? May I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in lieu of its being read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, instead of having read, the motion to recommit which he tried to offer. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the motion for the previous question has not been made.

Mr. ADAMSON. I made the motion, and asked the Chair if I could withhold it for one purpose only.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not withhold it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I insist upon my motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Why not let the gentleman offer his motion to recommit?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] offers his motion to recommit as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers another substitute for the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers an amendment to the motion to recommit which was offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] offers a substitute for the motion to recommit. The Clerk will report the Fowler amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wherever the word "fifty" appears in the motion to recommit, strike out the same and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five."

The SPEAKER. Now the Clerk will report the Donohoe substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the previous question ordered on the motion to recommit and the two propositions to amend it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia as soon as the Clerk reads the Donohoe substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. He wanted it read and printed.

Mr. DONOHOE. It will answer my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to have it printed.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I understood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] asks unanimous consent to have the substitute printed in the RECORD in lieu of having it read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the motion to recommit offered by Mr. DONOHOE:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"SECTION 1. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or any State or Territory thereof, any part of the lands and other property of the United States (including Alaska), reserved or unreserved, including lands in national forests, national monuments, military and other reservations, not including national parks, for a period not longer than 50 years for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works, necessary or convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms: Provided, That such leases shall be given within or through any of said national forests, military or other reservations only upon a finding by the chief officer of the department under whose supervision such forest, national monument, or reservation falls that the lease will not injure, destroy, or be inconsistent with the purpose for which such forest, national monument, or reservation was created or acquired: Provided further, That in the granting of leases under this act the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, give preference to applications for leases for the development of electrical power by States, counties, or municipalities, or for municipal uses and purposes: Provided further, That for the purpose of enabling an applicant for a lease to secure the data required in connection therewith, the Secretary of the Interior may, under general regulations to be issued by him, grant a preliminary permit authorizing the occupation of public lands valuable for water-power development for a period not exceeding one year in any case, which time may, however, upon application be extended by the Secretary if the completion of the application for lease has been prevented by unusual weather conditions or by some special or peculiar cause beyond the control of the permittee, the tenure of the proposed lease and the charges or rentals to be collected thereunder to be specified in said preliminary permit, and such permittee upon filing an application for lease prior to the expiration of the permit period shall be entitled to a preference right to lease the lands embraced in the permit upon the terms, conditions, and limitations authorized by this act.

"SEC. 2. The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized to lease to the citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, for a period not longer than 50 years, the right to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purposes across or in or across any of the navigable waters of the United States, or in or across any of the flowing waters to such navigable waters, whether navigable or nonnavigable; and said Interstate Commerce Commission is further authorized to lease for said period not to exceed 50 years to said mentioned parties any part of the boundary waters, navigable or nonnavigable, dividing the States of the United States from one another, for the erection therein or connected therewith of dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, and other works necessary to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon a breach of any of their terms: Provided, That such dams shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and when the plans and specifications for any dam to be constructed under the provisions of this act have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications, either before or after completion of the structure, unless the modifications of such plans or specifications has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided, That in approving the plans, specifications, and location for any dam, such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or maintaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate, without expense to the United States, in connection with any dam and accessory or appurtenant works, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress at any time may deem necessary in the interests of navigation, in accordance with such plans as they may approve, and also that whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of a lock or other structures for navigation purposes in connection with such dam the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power or power generated from water power for building and operating such constructions: Provided further, That in acting upon said plans as aforesaid the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War shall consider the bearing of said structure upon a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway over which it is to be constructed, with a view to the promotion of its navigable quality and the conservation and protection of waters contributory and contributing to its navigability, navigable or nonnavigable, and for the full development of water power, and as a part of the conditions and stipulations imposed by them shall provide for improving and developing navigation, and fix such charge or charges for the privilege granted as may be sufficient to restore conditions with respect to navigability as existing at the time such privilege be granted, or reimburse the United States for doing the same, and for such additional or further expense as may be incurred by the United States with reference to such project, including the cost of any investigations necessary for approval of plans and of such supervision of construction as may be necessary in the interests of the United States. The right is hereby reserved to the United States to construct, maintain, and operate, in connection with any dam built in accordance with the provisions of this act, a suitable lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structures for navigation purposes, and at all times to control the said dam and the level of the pool caused by said dam to such an extent as may be necessary to provide proper facilities for navigation. The persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise. The persons owning or operating any such dam or accessory works subject to the provisions of this act shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon, and such fishways as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe, and for failure so to do in any respect shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not less than $500, and each month of such failure shall constitute a separate offense and subject such persons to additional penalties therefor: Provided further, That as a condition to the issuing of said permit or the granting of said lease the applicant shall first present to said commission the request, in writing, of the respective States whose dividing line is said boundary waters, navigable or nonnavigable, which separates said States; the State in which said dam is to be erected shall provide for its method of application and the other States it and their method of approval.

"SEC. 3. That the international joint commission created by virtue of the provisions of article 8 of the treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the Dominions Beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, dated the 11th day of January, 1909, is hereby authorized to lease to the citizens of the United States, or those having declared their intention to become such, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the States bordering on the boundary waters between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for a period not longer than 50 years for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary or convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms: Provided further, That said international joint commission in granting of the leases mentioned under this act shall give preference to persons, firms, or corporations now using the waters of said boundary line conditional that the users of said waters shall obligate themselves to comply with all terms and provisions herein set forth and shall surrender to said international joint commission for the respective benefit of the respective Governments whatever easements that may now have by virtue of any lease or agreement with any of the respective States bordering on such boundary waters: Provided further, That said international joint commission shall issue no permit or authorize the granting of any lease to said mentioned parties until there shall be presented to it the consent, in writing thereto, of the respective States bordering on boundary waters in which it is proposed to erect said dam, such consent to be indicated in the matter mentioned herein in section 2: Provided further, That as a condition to the issuing of said permit by said international joint commission the said applicant shall present the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject to the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and when the plans and specifications for any dam to be constructed under the provisions of this act have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of such plans or specifications has been previously submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers, the Secretary of War, and the international joint commission: Provided further, That if it shall be found that said dam and accessory works have materially diverted said boundary waters or interfere with its natural flow whereby injury has occurred to the navigation interest on either side of said boundary water, or has in any way lowered the levels of said waters flowing across the boundary, the effect of which is to raise or lower the natural levels of the water on either side of the boundary waters whereby said navigation is affected or liable to become affected by reason of said interference, the said applicant shall upon notice in writing by said international joint commission remove the cause for the same and in case of inability to restore said waters to their natural levels then, and in that case, the said international joint commission shall cause notice in writing to be given to said lessee to remove said dam and restore said waters to their former condition without cost to the United States, Great Britain, or the international joint commission.

"SEC. 4. That all leases issued by the Secretary of the Interior, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the International Joint Commission made in pursuance of this act shall provide for the diligent, orderly, and reasonable development and continuous operation of the water power, subject to market conditions, and may provide that the lessee shall at no time, without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the International Joint Commission, contract for the delivery to any one consumer of electrical energy in excess of 50 per cent of the total output.

"SEC. 5. That every applicant for a lease, whether before the Secretary of the Interior, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the International Joint Commission, shall file a statement of his citizenship or the certificate of incorporation if organized under any State law or the laws of the United States, or the Territory thereof, together with a schedule of his or its assets and liabilities. That said applicant shall also file with said commission a further statement that he or it will not engage, directly or indirectly, in a like or similar business, nor will he combine with others in any unlawful trust, nor contract or conspire to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy, or the exercises of any other business contemplated.

"SEC. 6. That upon the issuing and granting of permit to build said dam and accessory works by either the Secretary of the Interior, Interstate Commerce Commission, or the International Joint Commission the said dam, its accessory works, and all its connections used in said plant shall be, and the same is hereby, declared for a period of three years from and after its completion to be forever released, and the same is hereby discharged, of and from all taxation, Federal, State, or municipal; and the capital stock, bona fide, issued or the capital invested by any individual or corporation, and the improvements here mentioned, are also for said period of three years declared to be free from all taxation, Federal, State, or municipal: Provided, however, That this exemption from taxation shall not apply to present existing enterprises now in operation.

"SEC. 7. That from and after said period of three years all holders of leases granted pursuant to the provisions of this act, as well as all existing enterprises now in operation and using the waters herein mentioned, irrespective of how organized, whether under State, Territorial, or Federal control, shall pay into the Treasury of the United States such a sum as the Interstate Commerce Commission shall find as a reasonable and fair charge to exact yearly for the privileges hereby granted, which sum so fixed shall be the annual rate or charge to be exacted for a period of five years, at the end of which period a new charge or price may be fixed as in the judgment of said commission it may deem reasonable and just, and such valuation shall continue during the lifetime of such lease; that the sum so paid in the Treasury of the United States shall continue to accumulate until the sum of $1,000,000 is paid in, at which time the then Congress shall dispose of it as it shall deem best.

"SEC. 8. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized to examine the books and accounts of all lessees under the terms of this act, irrespective of the authority issuing the same, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of water rights, lands, easements, and other property acquired, production, use, distribution, and sale of energy, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Interstate Commerce Commission may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or reports under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury; that each and all of said applicants shall file with said Interstate Commerce Commission schedules and classifications and tariffs of rates, charges, contracts, and agreements so fixed for light, power, heat, and other incidents connected with and going out of the water right hereby granted.

"SEC. 9. That said Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized when requested by the Secretary of the Interior or a majority of its members or by the International Joint Commission or by the Congress of the United States, to call upon the President of the United States to select a special committee for the purpose of fixing and adjusting the rates to be charged by said power companies or persons engaged in said hydroelectric business to consumers under leases by virtue of this act; that said committee to be composed of five members, three of whom shall be selected by said Interstate Commerce Commission from its members and two by the President of the United States not connected with said commission, who shall determine the question as to the reasonableness of rates charged to consumers; also whether or not the business of said corporations or permittees will justify the issuing of additional stock and bonds by said water-power company; that said special committee, when selected, is hereby authorized to employ experts to aid in the work of inquiry and examination, and such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as may be necessary to the performance of the duties herein imposed upon them; and they shall also determine, and when so determined shall be binding and become a part of the lease or permit so issued, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the charges made for the sale of its commodity; and the finding of said committee as to charges and the issuing of said stock and bonds shall be final and conclusive.

"SEC. 10. That the leases hereby granted shall expire at the time therein mentioned, but the said Secretary of the Interior and the Interstate Commerce Commission may, in writing, within five years prior to the termination or expiration of said leases, exercise the right to select said dams and accessory works for the use of the United States upon the payment to the owners thereof of such a price as shall be determined by said Interstate Commerce Commission; that at the expiration of said leases there shall be no renewal thereof except by Congress, nor shall there be paid to said lessees any sum of money for any property so erected and then remaining in and about the waters heretofore mentioned, save alone as Congress shall then determine. All conflicting provisions contained in any act of Congress granting consent to the construction of any dam are hereby repealed, and all such previous authorizations are to be altered, amended, and modified hereby as to conform to all of the conditions and provisions incorporated in this act."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a motion to recommit which I have had prepared.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting his motion to recommit. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I had prepared and intended to offer the following motion to recommit. Having been denied recognition for that purpose, because I am for the bill as amended, in favor of the gentleman from Minnesota, who asserted his intention to vote against the bill, I avail myself of the unanimous consent conferred to extend the proposed motion in the RECORD.

I move to recommit to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to report the same at once to the House, amended so as to read as follows:

"A bill (H. R. 17928) to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 23, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 1. That when authority has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly, or through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States, to any person to construct, maintain, and operate a dam and accessory works for water power or other purposes across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, such dam shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and after such approval it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of such plans or specifications has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War.

"'SEC. 2. That as a part of such approval such conditions and stipulations in addition to those hereinafter specified may be imposed as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate without expense to the United States, in connection with any dam or accessory or appurtenant works, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress may at any time deem necessary in the interest of navigation, in accordance with such plans as they may approve, and also whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of a lock or other structures for navigation purposes in connection with such dam, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such locks, structures, and approaches thereto, and shall furnish to the United States, free of cost, water power or power generated from water power for building, operating, and lighting such lock, structures, and approaches thereto, and at the discretion of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers may be required to maintain and operate such lock or locks or other structures without expense to the United States.

"'SEC. 3. That as a part of said approval the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall require that the plans, specifications, and location for any dam shall be such as shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power, and for other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize, in the interest of navigation and water-power development, the water resources of the region.

"'SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed as a part of the conditions and stipulations to provide—

"'(a) For reimbursement to the United States of all expenses incurred by the United States with reference to the project, including the cost of any investigation necessary for the approval of the plans as heretofore provided, and for such supervision of construction as may be necessary in the interest of the United States.

"'(b) For the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits which may accrue to such project from the construction, operation, and maintenance by the United States of headwater improvements on any such stream, including storage reservoirs and forest watersheds or lands acquired or held by the United States, such charges to be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War and to be based upon a reasonable compensation apportioned among the grantee and others similarly situated upon the same stream receiving direct benefits by reason of the development, improvement, or preservation of navigation in such stream in which such dam or appurtenant or accessory works may be constructed.

"'(c) For the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits which accrue to the grantee through authority given under this act, the proceeds thereof to be used for the development of navigation, but no charges made under this act shall prevent the earning of a reasonable return upon the actual investment of the grantee in any project constructed and operated under the provisions of this act, such investment to include the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, and in determining such annual charges the grantee shall be credited with the cost of the maintenance and operation of lock or locks or other aids to navigation.

"'(d) For the payment to the United States of such charge or charges as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable, and as may be sufficient to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval whenever they shall determine that navigation has been or will be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory and appurtenant works.

"'SEC. 5. That no charges shall be made for the benefits which accrue through authority given under this act to a State or municipal corporation developing electrical energy solely for municipal use in so far as there is direct distribution to consumers by State or municipality.

"'SEC. 6. That the operation of navigation facilities, which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with any such dam, whether at the expense of such grantee or of the United States, shall at all times be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by any such dam, as shall be made by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, and in the use and operation of such navigation facilities the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the uses of such dam by such grantee for power purposes. Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, and such fishways as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce; and for failure to comply with any such rule or regulation such grantee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not less than $500 for each month's default, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed or provided by law.

"'SEC. 7. That the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise.

"'SEC. 8. That if any grantee shall fail or refuse to comply with any of the provisions and requirements of this act, or to perform any of the stipulations and conditions prescribed as aforesaid by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, including the payment of the charges prescribed, or who shall fail or refuse, after receiving reasonable notice thereof, to comply with the lawful order of the Secretary of War, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and every month such grantee shall remain in default shall be deemed a new offense and subject such grantee to additional penalties therefor; and in addition to said penalties the Attorney General may, on request of the Secretary of War, institute proper proceedings in the district court of the United States in the district in which such structure or any of its accessory works are situated for the purpose of having such violation stopped by injunction, mandamus, or other process; and any such district court shall have jurisdiction over all such proceedings and shall have the power to make and enforce all writs, orders, and decrees necessary to compel the compliance with the requirements of this act and the lawful orders of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers and the performance of any condition or stipulation imposed under the provisions of this act; and if the unlawful construction, maintenance, and operation are shown to be such as shall require a revocation of all rights and privileges held under authority of this act, the court may decree such revocation. In case of such a decree the court may wind up the business of such grantee conducted under the rights in question, and may decree the sale of the dam and all appurtenant property constructed or acquired under the authority of this act, and may declare such dam and accessory and appurtenant works to be an unreasonable obstruction to navigation and cause their removal at the expense of the grantee owning or controlling the same, except when the United States has been previously reimbursed for such removal, or may provide for the sale of the dam and all accessory and appurtenant works constructed under authority of this act for the further development of water power, and may make and enforce such other and further orders and decrees as equity demands; and in case of such a sale for the further development of water power the vendee shall take the rights and privileges and shall perform the duties which belonged to the previous grantee, and shall assume such outstanding obligations and liabilities arising out of the construction, maintenance, and operation of said dam and accessory and appurtenant works for power purposes and navigation facilities as the court may deem equitable in the premises.

"'SEC. 9. That no right or privilege accruing from property or project constructed, maintained, or operated under the provisions of this act shall be assigned or transferred without the previous written consent and approval of the Secretary of War: Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall preclude the issuance of trust deeds or mortgages for the purpose of financing. Any successor or assign of such property or project, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original grantee hereunder.

"'SEC. 10. That the rights herein granted shall continue for a period not to exceed 50 years from and after the date of the original approval of the plans and specifications by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, but Congress may revoke any rights conferred in pursuance of this act whenever it is necessary for public use, and in the event of any such revocation by Congress the United States shall pay the owners thereof as hereinafter provided.

"'SEC. 11. That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the Secretary of War may terminate the rights hereby granted upon giving to the owners thereof one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States, or by any person authorized by Congress, of all of the property dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereby granted, which shall include all necessary and appurtenant property created or acquired, and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and all other property of the grantee, the value and usefulness of which would be destroyed or seriously impaired by such termination, and upon paying the actual cost of rights of ways, water rights, lands, and interest therein purchased and used by the grantee in the generation and distribution of electrical energy, and fair value of all other property taken over, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, and asssuming all contracts for electrical energy extending beyond the granting period which have had, or may have, the approval of the Secretary of War, and which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate. The actual costs and the fair value of said property shall be determined by agreement between the Secretary of War and the owners of such property, and in event of their failure to agree, then by proceedings instituted by the United States, in the district court of the United States within which any portion of such dam may be located. In the determination of the value of said property upon the termination or revocation of said grant as provided in this act no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted, for good will, going value, profit in pending contracts for electrical energy, for other conditions of current or prospective business, or for any other intangible element.

"'SEC. 12. That in all cases where the electric current generated from or by any of the projects provided for in this act shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce, or be transmitted to or from any State, Territory, foreign country, or the District of Columbia, the rates, charges, and service for the same to the ultimate consumers thereof shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable and unduly discriminatory charge, rate, or service therefor is hereby prohibited and declared to be illegal; and whenever the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that the rates or charges demanded or collected on the service rendered for such electric current are unjust, unreasonable, or unduly discriminatory, upon complaint made thereof and full hearing thereon the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be the just and reasonable rates and charges therefor to be observed as the maximum to be charged and the service to be rendered; and in case of the violation of any such order of the Secretary of War the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply. That in the valuation for rate-making purposes of the property existing under said approval of the project there may be considered any lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, but no value shall be claimed or allowed for authority granted by this act or for any other intangible element.

"'The Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to include among the conditions for his approval of any plans or any project herein provided, as an express condition thereof, a clause reserving to the Secretary of War the same rights, powers, and duties set forth in this section, together with the same penalty for violation thereof: Provided, That whenever the State in which such current shall be used provides by law adequate regulations for rates, charges, and service to the ultimate consumers for such electric current and such regulation, and such facts are established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then in such case the provision of this section shall not apply to the rates, charges, and service in and for such State.

"'SEC. 13. That the grantee shall commence the construction of the dam and accessory and appurtenant works within one year from the date of the approval herein provided, and shall thereafter, in good faith and with due diligence, prosecute such construction, and shall within the further term of three years complete and put in commercial operation such part of the ultimate development as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall deem necessary to supply the reasonable market demands, and extension of the periods herein specified, not to exceed one year, may be granted by the Secretary of War, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, when, in his judgment, the public interest will be promoted thereby, and after the completion of said dam and works they shall be operated continuously for the development of electrical energy. In case the grantee shall not commence actual construction within the time herein prescribed, then the authority as to such grantee shall terminate; and in case any dam and accessory and appurtenant works be not completed within the time herein specified or extended as herein provided, then the Attorney General, upon request of the Secretary of War, shall institute proper proceedings in the proper district court of the United States for the revocation of said authority, the sale or removal of the works constructed, and such other equitable relief as the case may demand as provided in section 9 of this act.

"'SEC. 14. That the Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to provide rules and regulations for uniform accounting; to examine the books and accounts of grantees under the terms of this act; to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to assets and liabilities, cost of water rights, rights of ways, lands, and other property acquired, the production, use, transmission, and sale of electrical energy. All such statements, representations, or reports shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and on such blanks as the Secretary of War may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, in addition to other penalties provided by law.

"'SEC. 15. That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to lease the surplus water and water power generated at dams and works now or hereafter constructed, wholly or in part by the United States in the interest of navigation, on such terms and conditions, and for such periods of time, not to exceed 50 years, as may be deemed by the Secretary of War for the best interest of the United States, subject, however, to the provisions of this act as aforesaid. In granting leases under this provision the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, give preference to applications for leases for the development of electrical power by States or municipalities developing electrical energy solely for municipal use; and all leases and the parties thereto and the terms and conditions thereof shall be reported annually to Congress.

"'SEC. 16. That the works constructed, maintained, and operated under the provisions of this act shall not be owned, leased, trusteed, controlled, or operated by any device, or in any manner so that they form a part of or in any manner effect any combination in the form of an unlawful trust or monopoly, or form the subject of an unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output or to fix, maintain, or increase prices of electric energy or in restraint of the generation, transmission, sale, or distribution of electric energy or the exercises of any other business contemplated: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful with the approval of the Secretary of War for different grantees to exchange and interchange currents, to assist one another whenever necessary, in his discretion, by supplementing the currents or power, and enable any grantee to secure assistance to carry on the business and supply his customers, accounting therefor any paying therefor under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

"'In no case shall such an arrangement be permitted to raise the price, render unjust or unfair any practice, work, or service, or operate in restraint of trade.

"'SEC. 17. That the word "persons" as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and the plural, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations. The word "dam" as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and the plural, as the case demands.

"'SEC. 18. That all provisions of this act shall apply alike to all existing enterprises in operation or authorized under an act entitled "An act to regulate, etc., approved June 23, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910"; and all conflicting provisions thereof are hereby repealed.

"'SEC. 19. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all dams which may be authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act. In such case the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested in such dam.'"

Mr. DONOHOE. I also desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Speaker, in presenting this substitute I desire to say that I do so at the request of Hon. Edward T. Cahill, who has made a special study of hydroelectric and navigation laws and has examined in detail the policies and plans of the water-power companies interested in this legislation.

Mr. Cahill brought the sovereign power of the State of Wisconsin into the controversy of the State of Illinois to conserve for public use the Illinois River and preserve for future generations the water passageway through the Great Lakes from the Atlantic to the Gulf. He also formed, and is now president of, the National Liberty and Commercial League, whose land and conservation policies are not limited to any individual idea or the declared policy of any set of men, but is as broad and comprehensive as the Nation itself.

DIFFERENCES IN BILLS.

It will be acknowledged by every Member of this House that there has been a great divergence of opinion as to which of the several bills presented is best for the public interest. The bill as first prepared by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was not satisfactory; neither was the bill introduced by Mr. FERRIS, of the Public Lands Committee, or the more recent report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted by Mr. CLINE, covering the waters of Niagara Falls.

Time will not permit an analysis of these bills, but suffice to say that after numerous conferences at the White House the Adamson bill has been so amended until the original bill would not be known, and the cause for these amendments is an effort to conserve the public interest and preserve, if possible, the best features of the dam act.

One of the defects of the Adamson bill, which has now been acknowledged, was the invasion of the prerogatives and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States and the existing rights now granted to power companies under permits issued by them.

In the bill presented by the Foreign Affairs Committee, through Mr. CLINE, the whole spirit of the other bills with reference to national control is sought to be destroyed. It is already well known to that committee, as well as to almost every Member of this House, that the State of New York has issued to the great power trust corporations now using the waters of the Falls of Niagara in the development of hydroelectric power franchises for a period of 999 years, without exacting one penny of compensation therefor; and by this bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs the question of compensation is to be fixed by that State which has absolutely parted with the rights of the public in this stream for all time. This feature, of course, has not been argued before this House for the reason that the waters involved at Niagara Falls are boundary waters and are not covered in the bill now before us for discussion; but in the substitute now introduced this feature, as well as numerous others, are embraced, as I will endeavor to show.

FAILURE TO PROTECT PUBLIC RIGHTS.

It will be noticed that there has been no suggestion of a change in section 7, page 6, by amendment or otherwise; yet this is fraught with most serious consequence to the public. In section 5 of the present navigation laws you will find that failure to comply with the lawful orders of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall be deemed a violation of the act, and the penalty there imposed for such violation has been reduced from $5,000 to $1,000; and there was given the right to the Secretary of War to declare what an obstruction to navigation consisted of, for it is well known to the Members of this House that upon removal of obstructions to navigation no damages could be had against the Government for such removal. All of this is changed by the present bill. You take this power away from the Secretary of War and vest it in the courts. "The district court is given jurisdiction over all such proceedings and has the power to make and enforce all orders for the enforcement of this act." It will be noticed on page 8 that the court is further directed and empowered to make and enforce "such other and further orders and decrees as equity may demand."

Under the language just quoted it is clear to me that questions of the policy of laws which are embodied in the Adamson bill are not to be determined by the officers of the Government, but by the court alone. You substitute here an executive power and seek to vest its discretion in a judicial court.

The seriousness of this language can be realized only when one stops to consider that you propose giving a lease for 50 years. At the end of these 50 years you can not terminate this lease, because you have vested in the court certain functions belonging to Congress, and the court, by reason of these functions, may prolong this lease indefinitely, and Congress, by its act, would surrender one of its prerogatives to the judicial power and place in its hands that which Congress alone should exercise. Congress would thereby absolutely part with its functions and leave them to a chancery court, which might tie the hands of the Government for years. In the meantime the power of the Government to improve its streams as the demands of commerce may warrant would be destroyed.

STATE AND FEDERAL RIGHTS INVOLVED.

The great question here is the power exercised by the respective States and the Federal Government in their navigable and nonnavigable waters. Decision after decision has been quoted on this floor. Those insisting upon State rights contend that the States alone shall be considered in the matter. Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota and Mr. ADAMSON, the advocates of this bill, are the exponents of this doctrine. Volumes of legal opinions have been cited on both sides of this controversy, and no public benefit has accrued by reason of these differences of opinion. Mr. STEVENS states—

> That for 100 years a man could put up a dam on a navigable stream and no Federal authority did attempt to interfere. It was so until the act of 1899, that provided that no dam should be constructed in a navigable stream without the consent of Congress. Up to that time a man could construct all the dams he wanted to put up and take all the chances he wanted to in a navigable stream under authority of the States or otherwise.

The questions of navigability and nonnavigability have been defined on this floor from the beginning down to the recent decisions in the Union Bridge case and the Chandler Dunbar case, until now the situation is charged with an atmosphere of uncertainty; and to the layman, uneducated in the niceties of the law, comes the perpetual questions, What is and what is not a navigable stream? When and where is the line to be drawn?

If the Adamson bill is passed it means the destruction of the work accomplished by the Mississippi River Commission created under an act of Congress of June 28, 1879, and numerous acts amendatory thereto, whereby the Government has already expended over $130,000,000, as well as authorized the further expenditure of millions for protecting the headwaters of not only this stream, but also others coursing from their fountain heads through the various States of the Union.

It is too late to go backward, so we must go forward. Already our reclamation and national reservation acts and those for the preservation of our forests have produced results incapable of being measured by dollars and cents. The whole arid wilderness of the West is endangered, and the irrigation act of June, 1902, which resulted in the erection of the great reservoir in Phoenix, Ariz., is threatened by this bill. The great good already accomplished, the expenditure of close to $1,000,000,000, the general improvement of the rivers, harbors, and canals, aided and assisted by the Federal Government, and the great future now contemplated by the General Government which has for its object the conservation of the Federal resources of the Nation would be bartered away for little or nothing.

THE SUBSTITUTE BILL.

The substitute which I have presented covers the various objections that I have mentioned and seeks to better protect the public interest in the water power of the Nation.

We vest in the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture all the fundamental powers claimed by them under the existing law, and we preserve the unity of the States and their sovereignty in that no permit shall issue unless it shall first have the approval of the State.

We would give the Secretary of War the right to consider not only navigable streams, but tributaries and contributing waters which make them navigable, thus settling for all time this uncertain question; and following the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the doctrine set forth in the later decisions, whereby they hold that any interference with nonnavigable streams contributing to the navigability of the navigable ones is within the power and duty of the Federal Government to take the proper precautions to preserve and safeguard these for future generations. These questions are thus settled for all time.

All theoretical and speculative questions as to navigability, State or Federal control, are here settled, and no one can complain, either the private owner or municipality, the State or National Government.

The question of determining whether a permit shall issue is safeguarded by the requirement of the seal of the State, and it is further protected in boundary waters between States by requiring joint action by the States in interest.

The powers here conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission have indirectly been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

We have strengthened the arm of the War Department in the protection of our navigable streams by providing that they shall also consider tributary and contributing waters, and we have also provided for the protection of our commerce upon the Great Lakes and the other water highways of the Nation.

We also provide for and vest in the Joint International Commission the power to issue permits in international boundary waters, but call for joint action by the bordering States, and thereby preserve in such permit the levels of the lakes and preserve for all time their navigation.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

The exemption from taxation in the great manufacturing States of Illinois and Pennsylvania of the capital stock of manufacturing corporations has contributed to their unusual growth and development in those States, and with the object of inviting capital in these new enterprises we provide that all corporations and persons to whom a permit shall issue shall be free from taxation for a period of not less than three years.

This substitute provides for a revaluation every five years and a rental based thereon to be paid annually to the Government of the United States. The disposition of this fund, after it has accumulated to the amount of $1,000,000, is left to the future action of Congress.

It further provides that the Government shall have the right within five years before the expiration of the lease to take the property, but it does not compel the Government to do so, the intention being to leave with Congress the power to determine the future. We can not grant a vested interest; we can only give the right to use that for which the Government and the State are mere naked trustees.

These waters are incapable of ownership, and therefore can not be subject to a grant. The license to use can never attach itself so as to impose a duty on the grantor, for he can never make a grant; he can issue a license to use, but never grant an easement as against the public, so that the public at any time can, if it desires, recall the grant. Here we are dealing not with land but with incorporated hereditaments. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves the previous question on the Smith amendment, the Fowler amendment to the Smith amendment, and the Donohoe substitute. The question is on agreeing to the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 70.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. FOWLER was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Donohoe substitute.

The substitute of Mr. DONOHOE was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota demanded a division, but pending the division withdrew the demand.

So the motion of Mr. SMITH of Minnesota to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes appear to have it; the ayes have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DONOVAN. Too late.

The SPEAKER. No; it is not too late.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think the Speaker had made the announcement.

The SPEAKER. Oh, it is done that way every day. The Chair did not notice that the gentleman from Kansas was up. The gentleman from Kansas demands the yeas and nays.

The question being taken, 26 Members voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-six Members have voted in favor of ordering the yeas and nays, and 56 have voted against ordering the yeas and nays. Twenty-six, being more than one-fifth, are a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. I make the point that there is no quorum present, Mr. Speaker. I think that is more convenient.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum present. There is no quorum present. There is no use to pretend to count. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 191, nays 47, answered "present" 6, not voting 188, as follows:

Mr. AVIS (for dam bill) with Mr. REED (against).

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania (for dam bill) with Mr. WALTERS (against).

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no"; but I find I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. GITTINS, and I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 23. An act for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13, and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District;

S. 6192. An act to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act; and

S. 3176. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 169. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation and to appoint delegates to participate in the International Conference on Social Insurance; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 5798. An act authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Earl A. Bancroft from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Mantorville, Minn.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution authorizing the President to extend invitations to other nations to send representatives to the International Dry Farming Congress to be held at Wichita, Kans., October 7 to 17, inclusive, 1914; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 5259. An act to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 6039. An act for the coinage of certain gold and silver coins in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a personal matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to address the House on a personal matter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] addressed the House yesterday on a question of personal privilege. In that connection he read a clipping from the New York Sun which quoted me as saying that Mr. KINDEL was the paid agent or attorney of the express companies.

I never made that statement and do not recollect having given any interview to the Sun. Fortunately I have a memorandum showing what I did say for publication in another newspaper, and I desire to read that into the RECORD. By way of preface I might say that this statement was provoked by the announcement of my colleague that he had left the Democratic Party. The statement as I gave it to the newspaper man was as follows:

When a mattress maker with populistic tendencies is elected to Congress by Democratic votes and suddenly discovers that John D. Rockefeller is a big-hearted philanthropist who deserves well of his country, it is time for the mattress maker to pack his grip and move over into the Republican Party.

Mr. KINDEL was elected to Congress because he convinced the people of Colorado that he was the friend and champion of the parcel post. I think he was quite sincere in this declaration when he made it out in Colorado, but since coming to the Capital he has undergone a most amazing change.

While he is probably the least influential, he is undoubtedly the most persistent and by long odds the most unfair opponent that the friends of the parcel post have been compelled to combat during the last 18 months. He has given aid and comfort to the express companies and has stayed up nights in his effort to hamper and embarrass the parcel post.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that was the statement as I gave it to the press. That was the statement which, in various forms, I have reiterated from time to time, and that is the statement which I now desire to lay before the House, and through the House before the voters of the gentleman's congressional district.

If he will only possess his soul in patience for a few weeks more we will both be back in Colorado and we will have an opportunity to appear together before the voters of his district, and then I shall have my opportunity to tell those voters exactly what the gentleman has been doing down here.

It will be a very entertaining and at times a very amusing story, but it will afford me a great deal of pleasure to tell it to our people, and I shall not stop at the parcel post. I will, perhaps, tell the voters of the gentleman's district the story of how one year ago he introduced in this House a resolution attacking the Attorney General of the United States. That resolution contained statements of facts which were repudiated by the President of the United States, and when an investigation was made to ascertain the authorship of the resolution it was ascertained that the man who wrote it was David Lamar, the "Wolf of Wall Street." According to Mr. Lamar's own confession he had resolutions of that kind introduced in this House for the purpose of rigging the stock market, and I will give the gentleman from Colorado an opportunity to explain to his constituents why he permitted himself to be used by the "Wolf of Wall Street."

I thank the House for having given me this opportunity to make this statement.

REGULATION OF THE CATCHING OF SPONGES.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 5313) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same; and for other purposes, was passed yesterday, by which it was ordered to be read a third time and passed, in order that I may offer an amendment which was omitted yesterday by oversight.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit, the Chair will simplify his request. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to vacate all of the actions and orders of the House on the bill S. 5313, regulating the catching of sponges, back to the amending stage. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The bill has not yet been sent to the Senate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; it is yet on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman will send his amendment up to the desk.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, line 5, by striking out the word "to" after the word "request," so that the line as amended will read: "to make arrests and seize vessels and sponges, and upon his request the Secretary of the Treasury may employ," etc.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LOCATORS OF OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5673, with House amendments, disagreed to by the Senate, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 4969) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1060).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4969) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 5, 8, 9, 10, and 12, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 4, 6, 7, and 11.

JNO. A. KEY,
EDWARD KEATING,
SAM R. SELLS,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHAS. F. JOHNSON,
WM. HUGHES,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4969) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, submit the following writtten statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submittted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, viz:

On amendments Nos. 2, 3, 5, 8, 10, and 12 the Senate concurs in the House amendments, as these are all corrections of soldiers' service.

On amendment No. 1 the House recedes, as the evidence shows that the widow is the wife of a brigadier general, and the amount proposed by the Senate bill is in conformity with the Senate rules relating to similar cases.

On amendment No. 4 the House recedes, as the evidence shows that the widow is the wife of a brigadier general, and the amount proposed by the Senate bill is in conformity with the Senate rules relating to similar cases.

On amendment No. 6 the House recedes, as the evidence on file in support of this measure justifies the allowance of proposed pension.

On amendment No. 7 the House recedes, as the $12 pension proposed is fully justified by the evidence.

On amendment No. 9 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence is not deemed sufficient to warrant proposed pension.

On amendment No. 11 the House recedes, as the evidence on file with the bill fully justifies the proposed increase to $12.

Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I also call up the conference report on the bill S. 5278, an omnibus pension bill, of similar title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1061).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5278) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, and 15, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

Amendment numbered 6: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 6, and agree the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$24"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 10 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$24"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$24"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$40"; and the House agree to the same.

On amendments Nos. 1, 4, 5, 7, 8, and 13 the Senate concurs in the House amendments, as these are all corrections of soldiers' service.

On amendment No. 2 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as a higher rate than $24 is not warranted by the proofs on file.

On amendment No. 3 the House recedes, as the evidence clearly shows proposed pension of $15 is justified.

On amendment No. 6 the Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing a pension of $24. The conferees believe the evidence on file in support of the bill fully justifies this amount.

On amendment No. 9 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence on file does not justify the proposed pension.

On amendment No. 10 the Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $24 to soldier, this amount being fully justified by the proof filed.

On amendment No. 11 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proofs are not deemed sufficient to warrant proposed pension.

On amendment No. 12 the Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $24. The Senate passed the bill at $30 and the House struck the item out. Soldier is pensioned at $17 per month for disease of right leg, resulting in varicose veins and malarial poisoning. Soldier's increased disability, as shown by the evidence, clearly justifies an allowance of $24 per month pension.

On amendment No. 14 the Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $40. The evidence on file in support of this bill is believed by the conferees to justify proposed rate.

On amendment No. 15 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence does not warrant a higher rating.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 4, 9, and 16.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$50"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$30"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$24"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$30"; and the House agree to the same.

On amendments Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, 13, and 17: The Senate concurs in the House amendments, as these are all corrections of soldiers' service.

On amendment No. 1: The Senate concurs, as the evidence is not considered sufficient to warrant proposed pension.

On amendment No. 2: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing widow $50. The Senate passed the bill at $75 and the House struck the item out. The conferees believe that a rating of $50 is fully justified by the circumstances of the case as presented by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate concurs, as the proposed increase of pension is not warranted by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 4: The House recedes, as the $20 proposed by the bill is clearly justified by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 9: The House recedes, as the evidence on file is deemed sufficient to warrant proposed pension of $12 to widow.

On amendment No. 10: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence presented in support of the bill is not deemed sufficient to warrant proposed pension.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $30. Soldier is blind and requires the aid and attention of another person for his care, and the conferees believe the $30 rating is fully justified.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $24. This rating is fully justified by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 14: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $30. The evidence on file in support of this bill warrants proposed pension of $30.

On amendment No. 15: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as proposed pension is not justified by the evidence in the case.

On amendment No. 16: The House recedes, as proposed amendment is erroneous.

On amendment No. 18: The Senate concurs in the House amendment—a correction.

On amendment No. 19: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the rating is deemed sufficient under the proofs filed.

On amendment No. 1 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proposed pension of $20 is not warranted by the evidence on file.

On amendments Nos. 2, 4, 6, 11, 15, 17, and 18 the Senate concurs in the House amendments, as these are all corrections of soldiers' service.

On amendment No. 3 the Senate occurs in the House amendment, as proposed increase of pension is not warranted by the facts in the case.

On amendment No. 5 the Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $12, which is fully justified by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 7 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence presented in support of the bill does not justify proposed pension.

On amendment No. 8 the Senate concurs, as proposed pension is not warranted by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 9 the Senate concurs, as a rating of more than $17 per month is not warranted by the proofs on file.

On amendment No. 10 the House recedes, as proposed pension of $20 is fully justified by the facts in the case.

On amendment No. 12 the House recedes, as proposed pension of $20 is warranted by the evidence.

On amendment No. 13 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as proposed pension is not justified by the evidence.

On amendment No. 14 the House recedes, as a pension of $12 per month is justified by the evidence.

On amendment No. 16 the Senate concurs in the House amendment, as proposed increase of pension is not justified by the proofs on file.

On amendment No. 19 the House recedes, as the evidence on file in support of this bill clearly shows that proposed pension of $24 per month is just and proper.

On amendment No. 20 the House recedes, as proposed amendment is erroneous.

On amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 the House concurs in the Senate amendments. This is merely a change of phraseology.

On amendment No. 5 the House concurs in the Senate amendment. It is not believed that the allowance of pension is warranted in this case.

On amendment No. 6 the House concurs in the Senate amendment. The evidence in this case does not warrant or justify an increase in rate.

On amendments Nos. 7, 8, and 9 the House concurs in the Senate amendments. This is a change of phraseology only.

On amendment No. 10 the Senate recedes. It is not believed that a higher rate than $30 per month is warranted in this case.

On amendments Nos. 11, 12, 13, and 14 the House concurs in the Senate amendments. This is merely a change in the phraseology.

On amendment No. 15 the Senate recedes. The evidence in this case fully justifies the allowance of pension at the rate of $12 per month to the widow and $2 per month additional for the minor children of the soldier.

On amendments Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29 the House concurs in the Senate amendments. These are only changes in phraseology.

On amendment No. 30 the Senate recedes. A pension of $12 per month to the widow and $2 per month additional to the minor children of the soldier is fully warranted in this case.

On amendments Nos. 31, 32, 33, and 34 the House concurs in the Senate amendments. These are merely corrections in the service of soldier.

On amendment No. 35 the House concurs in the Senate amendment. This provides for the allowance of $2 per month additional to the minor children of William T. POSTAL AND CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Rules, I present a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 584.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17042, entitled, "A bill to amend the postal and civil-services laws, and for other purposes." There shall be not exceeding six hours of general debate, one-half of which time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], and one-half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH]. At the conclusion of general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule, and after being perfected the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such recommendation as it may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit: Provided, That all debate upon the bill and amendments shall be limited to the subject matter thereof.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if there is any desire for time on that side on this rule.

Mr. MANN. We would like to have about an hour on this side on the rule, but I would be willing to compromise by voting for the rule if the gentleman would be willing to extend the time on the bill from six to eight hours.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman be willing to meet at 11 o'clock on Thursday?

Mr. MURDOCK. To start then?

Mr. MANN. There is no such emergency as that, but I do not care——

Mr. MURDOCK. It will run over two days, anyhow.

Mr. MANN. All right; I will have no objection to meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be amended so as to strike out the word "six" before the word "hours," in line 7, and insert the word "seven."

Mr. MANN. Eight.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Seven hours was the gentleman's request.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not use it if he does not want to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I misunderstood the gentleman; I thought he was simply desiring to have one hour additional debate.

Mr. MANN. We want an extra hour on this side.

Mr. MOON. I suggest that that time be equally divided, whether it be six, seven, or eight hours.

Mr. MANN. The rule provides for that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire eight hours' debate?

Mr. MANN. We want four hours; the gentleman need not use all his time if he does not want to do so.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman desire to say about the amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will agree to the amendment. I know of several Members who would like more time than they could possibly get under the six-hour arrangement. It will take two days, anyhow, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire, of course, to be stubborn about the matter. All the time is given in this rule as it is reported from the committee that was asked by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads who reported the bill that is to be considered. Not only all the time was given, but two hours more than were requested was given, because we anticipated that we would have——

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. When the gentleman says the Committee on Rules gave all the time requested by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I am sure they were not consulting the minority of the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I mean as presented to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I desire to say I have had requests for more than four hours' time.

Mr. MOON. I suggest to my colleague that inasmuch as so many gentlemen have asked for time in general debate that he make this eight hours, and give four hours to a side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the word "six" be stricken out and the word "eight" be inserted, in line 7, before the word "hours."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the word "six" be stricken out before the word "hours" and the word "eight" inserted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow, Wednesday, it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Thursday.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to that request.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to get this request disposed of first.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] has just objected to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut said he was going to object.

Mr. MANN. We have a priviliged matter in the nature of a report from the Committee on Rules, on which the previous question has not been ordered, and it is subject to amendment, and it might be provided that when the House meet on Thursday it meet at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman can not take me off my feet by a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will propound his inquiry.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to inquire whether or not the gentleman from Connecticut objected or whether he said he was going to object?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman objected.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. I followed the rule as carefully as I could. Did the rule permit amendment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. No limitation on amendment and no limitation to debate under the five-minute rule. It comes under the general rules of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. And after the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and one motion to recommit?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. One motion to recommit. I renew my request that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee renews his request that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. Thursday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is there any desire for debate on this rule?

Mr. MANN. No; we agreed to an amendment that covered that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this rule simply provides for the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, providing for the weighing of mails, and for other purposes. I move the previous question on the adoption of the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that immediately on the adoption of the resolution the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17042, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17042, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it is rather late in the day to begin the general debate. I believe there is no one present on either side who desires to speak this afternoon.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] propose to open the debate on Thursday morning himself?

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry. Has the first reading of the bill been dispensed with?

Mr. MOON. I am going to make that motion if I have the opportunity.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was discussing whether or not we would have debate.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

BRIDGE ACROSS SULPHUR RIVER, TEX.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 6031, which is an emergency bridge bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] asks unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 6031, which is in the nature of an emergency measure and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6031) authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to build, maintain, and operate a public highway bridge across the Sulphur River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "public highway."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WINGO, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, August 5, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $301,465 for the manufacture in the current fiscal year by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of 5,000,000 sheets of notes for the United States Treasurer and 3,000,000 sheets of national-bank notes, which are estimated to be required in addition to those already appropriated for (H. Doc. No. 1138), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GILMORE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13489) increasing the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the construction thereon of a post-office building at Waltham, Mass., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1069), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 5, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our heavenly Father, as we come to meet the tasks of this day our thoughts go up to Thee for Thy blessing. In the midst of the busy whirl of life, and in the sound of the confusion of nations, we come to Thee for wisdom and grace to act well our part. In meeting all the difficult problems that face us, may we have the equipment of patience, and courage, and faith in God. Strengthen Thy servants for every duty, and lead us always and under all circumstances in the paths of righteousness, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, August 3, 1914, was read and approved.

REVENUES OF RAIL CARRIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 3, 1914.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: In further response to the resolution of the Senate of the United States of March 23, 1914, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate, from time to time as taken and transcribed, a copy of all evidence introduced and all exhibits received in evidence by said commission at hearings in the cases, Docket No. 5860 entitled 'Revenues of Rail Carriers in Official Classification Territory,' and Investigation and Suspension Docket No. 333 entitled 'Rate Increases in Official Classification Territory.'"

The Interstate Commerce Commission has the honor to transmit herewith volumes 38 to 42, inclusive, embracing such further evidence as was introduced and exhibits as were received in evidence at the hearings before the commission in cases covered by your resolution in full compliance with the resolution as of this date. Each volume is labeled and contains an index of the contents of the volume. Copies of certain additional exhibits and compilations will be submitted at an early date to complete compliance with the resolution.

Respectfully,

JAMES S. HARLAN, Chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and the accompanying papers will be printed as heretofore authorized.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of an emergency measure now on the calendar. It is the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he will not withhold that request until the ordinary morning business has been transacted.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If I do that, it will then defer the consideration and the proposed passage of the bill to-day, because at 12 o'clock we will be required to take up the trade commission bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No; at 1 o'clock.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not know that there will be any discussion on this bill, and if there be no discussion it will not interfere with the order of morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very sure that it will lead to discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. There will be some discussion, not prolonged, but there will be more or less discussion.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Utah prefers that we should defer the matter until the routine business is disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. I prefer that the Senator should defer it until we get through with the ordinary morning business.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will withdraw the request for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Springfield, Oreg., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Presbyterian Synod of Oregon, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Interstate Cotton Seed Crushers' Association, held in New Orleans, La., May 20, 1914, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution as to our foreign trade adopted by the Interstate Cotton Seed Crushers' Association at their annual meeting held in New Orleans, La., May 20, 1914.

Whereas the Government of Austria-Hungary continues to unduly discriminate against American edible cottonseed oil; and

Whereas there appears to be no intention on the part of that country to seriously consider the urgent solicitations of our State Department for fulfillment of promises made when trade relations were entered into; and

Whereas there is apparently a disposition on the part of foreign countries generally to increase the duties and in some cases discriminate against edible cottonseed oil and its allied products, especially in South America and South Africa; and

Whereas the continuance of such policy on the part of foreign Governments without power on the part of our own country to retaliate under the present tariff act must necessarily result disastrously to our export trade; and

Whereas the new tariff law has in it no means either for maintenance or extension of foreign trade, other than the general power conferred on the President to negotiate new commercial treaties; and

Whereas recent experiences have shown that the material reductions in duties on imports under the present act for which reciprocal concessions on the part of foreign Governments were effected indicates that there is an indisposition on the part of such countries to seriously consider any reduction in their duties on American products except on the basis of still further concessions from existing tariff rates: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Interstate Cotton Seed Crushers' Association, representing practically the entire industry, in convention assembled at New Orleans, this 20th day of May, 1914, That—

(1) It is the sense of the industry here represented that inasmuch as it is obviously impossible under present conditions to secure from foreign countries favorable consideration of questions involving tariff discriminations against the products of the industry, and consequent loss of its export trade;

(2) That supplementary legislation is manifestly necessary, either for the maintenance or extension of foreign trade;

(3) That the industry, being now fully cognizant of the necessity for some power of automatic penalization for present and future discrimination against its products, demand that its export interest be given by the United States Congress the serious consideration to which it is justly entitled, and that provision be made for power of automatic penalization, such as is provided in paragraph 644 of the existing law covering wheat and wheat products and paragraph 581 covering potatoes; and be it further

Resolved, That copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Cabinet officers, and to each Senator and Member representing, respectively, States and districts where this industry is a factor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Interstate Cotton Seed Crushers' Association, held in New Orleans, La., May 20, 1914, relative to the present oleomargarine law, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution for the repeal of the present Federal oleomargarine law, adopted by the Interstate Cotton Seed Crushers' Association at their annual meeting, held in New Orleans, La., May 20, 1914.

Whereas our Federal Government still recognizes and maintains the unjust and iniquitous tax of 10 cents per pound on colored oleomargarine; and

Whereas there is no justification for a tax which is un-American and contrary to the principles of the present administration, in that it taxes and places a burden on an article of daily food; and

Whereas the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue indicates a most unsatisfactory condition as to the enforcement and operation of the present law, and has recommended remedies, some of which we approve: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Cotton Seed Crushers' Association, in convention assembled at New Orleans this 20th day of May, 1914, demand from the present administration a repeal of the present law and a total abolishment of the tax. We feel that the support of all Democratic Congressmen should be given to the bill H. R. 9906, recently introduced by Representative BUCHANAN of Texas, as a means of properly safeguarding the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President, to the Cabinet officers, and to the southern Senators and Members of the House.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 2824) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," approved March 3, 1891, and I submit a report (No. 720) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to this report.

Mr. SMOOT. As the bill may lead to some discussion, I shall not ask unanimous consent for its present consideration at this time, but will let it go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope to call it up soon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2668) for the relief of Martha Hazelwood, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 723) thereon.

Mr. LEE of Maryland, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1373. A bill for the relief of the estate of John Stewart, deceased (Rept. No. 725);

H. R. 3920. A bill for the relief of William E. Murray (Rept. No. 726); and

H. R. 6420. A bill for the relief of Ella M. Ewart (Rept. No. 724).

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11765) to perfect the title to land belonging to the M. Forster Real Estate Co., of St. Louis, Mo., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 722) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 6162) authorizing the issuance of patent for certain lands to Thomas L. Griffiths, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 721) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 6216) granting a pension to John H. Burke (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 6217) to increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SECURITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS.

Mr. CATRON. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes. I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On line 9 of the first page, after the word "act" and before the word "and," insert the following: "all corporations, joint-stock associations, and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock organized to carry on business for profit, engaged, or which may hereafter be engaged, in the transmission of electricity for power, lighting, heating, or any other purposes, in any manner whatsoever, from one State or Territory in the United States or the District of Columbia to any State or Territory of the United States or District of Columbia, all of which corporations and associations are hereby constituted and made common carriers and shall come under the terms of, and be subject to, the provisions of this act."

Mr. CATRON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow immediately after the close of the morning business I shall address the Senate on the subject of this amendment.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD AND CARNEGIE FOUNDATION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I offer a resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 437), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor each is hereby requested and directed to furnish to the Senate the following information: The relation, if any, of the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation to the work of their respective departments; a statement showing the names and positions of all employees, if any, of the department whose salaries are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation; the names and positions of all administrative officers, if any, of the department who are in any way connected with the work of the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation, and the salaries, if any, received by them from the said Rockefeller Foundation or Carnegie Foundation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURTON. I was detained by a session of a committee and have just entered the Chamber. I should like to ask the general purport of the resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is simply to get information from these departments as to whether or not either of these boards are contributing money to the expenses of the Government, and the names of the employees on the roll, if any.

Mr. BURTON. Has not that information already been furnished, particularly in regard to the Rockefeller fund?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Only in reference to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BURTON. This is general?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is general. The resolution simply asks for information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PARKS WITHIN RECLAMATION PROJECTS IN MONTANA.

Mr. PITTMAN. On April 28 last I was appointed one of the conferees on behalf of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 657) to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects in the State of Montana, and for other purposes. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and I was appointed on the conference during the protracted illness of the Senator from Montana. He is now in the Senate and is familiar with the measure, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be relieved from further service as a member of the conference committee and that he be appointed in my place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity of reading this bill. I have just at this moment obtained a copy of it. Does the Senator from New York think there is such an emergency for this particular measure at this time that it ought to be disposed of without giving some of us an opportunity of looking into it?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the proposition is a very simple one. The bill is a short one and can be readily understood. The President of the United States and the administration think that the public interests will be served by the immediate passage of the bill.

In a word, disaster is threatening the cotton and the agricultural interests of this country. Thousands of American citizens are abroad unable to secure passage home. Disaster to the cotton and the agricultural interests is threatened because, although we have the most bountiful crops ever known in the history of the Government, we find ourselves without transportation facilities. The passage of this bill will go far toward remedying this very unfortunate situation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question in my mind was whether or not a delay of 24 hours is going to add to the undesirable situation.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Every day's delay is fraught with great financial loss to the cotton and agricultural interests in every part of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, of course I am in favor quite as earnestly as the Senator from New York can be of the passage of any legislation which is well considered that will tend to ameliorate the present situation in any way, but at the same time I think there is some danger of our permitting ourselves to go off on a wave of hysteria about this matter. The fact that there is presented to us this grave situation will not justify us in losing our heads and failing to carefully consider any proposed legislation.

The Senator from New York has given this matter consideration. He may be quite right about it, but, speaking for myself, I have given it no consideration. I have not even up to this moment read the bill. I have simply had it put into my hands now.

I dislike to interfere in the matter, and I dislike also to be forced to act upon a measure to which I have not been able to give the slightest consideration.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I can state in a minute the salient features of this legislation. The bill has three provisions.

In the Panama Canal act of 1912, with a view to increasing our merchant marine, Congress inserted a provision permitting

American registry to any foreign-built ship not more than 5 years old owned by an American citizen or an American corporation. The first provision in this bill is to strike out that five-year limitation. The reason why it was inserted originally was this: Eager as we were to increase our merchant marine by admitting to American registry foreign-built ships owned by American citizens we did not want to encourage the reception into our merchant marine of old ships. So we indicated a maximum period of five years. It is sought to remove that limitation because there are many ships more than 5 years old now sailing under foreign flags and belonging to citizens of the United States. By the removal of the five-year limitation our merchant marine will be enlarged by a great many of those vessels.

The second provision is——

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator, at this point, indicate to the Senate why he thinks an American citizen will invest his money in a ship more than 5 years old when he has failed and is failing to invest it in ships less than 5 years old?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I assume that, owing to the great pressure that will be made on whatever number of ships we have available for the transportation of our products abroad, the immediate rewards to the owners of the ships at this time, and so long as the war continues, will be greater than they would be in normal times, and what might be an unattractive proposition, and has been during the past two years, might become attractive as a commercial proposition to owners of ships while this unfortunate war lasts in Europe.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me? The Merchant Marine Commission interrogated shipbuilders; and not only that, but the large capitalists of the country—the bankers and others in New York and Boston and Baltimore, especially—to know if they would, if a free-ship bill were passed, invest in ships of foreign make and run them in competition with foreign nations, and they all said they would not do so because of the increased cost of navigating the ships. The contention has been made for years and years, especially by the party to which the Senator from New York belongs, that the solution of the merchant-marine problem was in permitting our people to purchase foreign ships and sail them under the American flag. Acceding to that demand, some of us who did not believe in it agreed that in the Panama Canal act a provision should be inserted which granted to our people that privilege. Now, it is a notorious fact that not one single foreign ship has been purchased and is sailing under our flag since the passage of that act.

As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] very potently inquires, is it probable that our people who will not buy ships less than 5 years old will buy the old junks, the old tramps, that are navigating the oceans of the world and put them into our foreign commerce? I can not conceive that we are going to do it if this bill is passed.

I have some other observations to submit that I will make in my own time.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator think any possible harm can come to American interests by allowing even what he calls old boats to fly the American flag?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that, while I am not a lawyer, I have very grave apprehensions that if we undertake to establish a merchant marine in accordance with the provisions of this act we may find ourselves complicated to such an extent that we may be engaged in war in the near future, as I shall point out later on.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I attended the committee meeting yesterday which considered this bill, and the Commissioner of Navigation appeared before us. I do not recall that any statement was made by him giving any information as to how many vessels more than 5 years old are now owned by Americans which would be available if this bill were passed. I ask the Senator from New York if he happens to be in possession of such information?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes; I can furnish some information on that point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that would be germane to the subject.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The American-Hawaiian fleet of 26 steamers was built and procured largely for the Panama Canal trade, which will soon be opened. Only a few of those have been built within five years. The company owning them is an American company. Under this law, if the five-year limitation is removed, such of their ships as may have been built abroad can all fly the American flag and be immune from molestation or seizure while engaged in the Atlantic trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, has the Senator any information that that fleet which is now engaged in profitable business would voluntarily transfer itself to the trans-Atlantic service?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I suppose that every American citizen who is patriotic will respond to the appeal of the American Government at this time to save large agricultural interests from disaster and to give an opportunity to American citizens who are practically exiled in Europe to come home. These things can not be accomplished unless we are able to put on the ocean ships flying the American flag.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we all sympathize with that view. I will say to the Senator from New York that his suggestion about patriotism is something that I have urged in season and out of season with reference to establishing an American merchant marine, but there was not a response to it from some sections of the country.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I may say further, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], that the United Fruit Co., owned by an American corporation, has nearly two dozen vessels flying the British flag, which could come in under the provisions of this law if the five-year limitation were removed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator from New York if he thinks that the American Fruit Co. would abandon the business in which they are now engaged and transfer their vessels to the trans-Atlantic service to take our crops abroad?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I presume they would devote at least some of their vessels to the more immediate needs of the American people.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think the illustration selected by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] was unfortunate. The American-Hawaiian Co. is already under the American flag, the United Fruit Co., the Belgian Red Star Line, and the New York-Pacific are, perhaps, the principal lines owned by American capital under foreign flags. Then, again, the International Mercantile Marine Co., as a holding company, has several lines—the White Star, the Leyland, and others—in addition to the Belgian Red Star. The capital invested in these, however, is not predominantly American, as I understand it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. As I understand, there are but four steamships of the American line now carrying the American flag.

Mr. BURTON and Mr. SMOOT. There are six.

Mr. O'GORMAN. There are four in the American line and two in the Red Star line, making six altogether.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is a force of vessels entirely inadequate to the needs of this country if we are to be dependent upon our own lines of transportation. Heretofore our mistake has been that, great as we have been as a producing country, we have been absolutely dependent on the foreigner for the transportation of our products; the value of our products has been dependent upon our ability to transport them and the influences that control the transportation could, in consequence, control the value of our products. As has been stated on this floor but recently when another topic was before the Senate for consideration, American industry, so far as foreign trade is concerned, has been absolutely dependent upon the foreigner, so dependent that it has been said that during the last 10 years the foreign shipowners have increased their rates, have increased their tribute on American industry almost 300 per cent. To-day, because of the calamities that are afflicting Europe, we are unable even to secure the ship of the foreigner. Foreign ships do not dare to put to sea and if we do not procure some means of transporting the products of the farm and of the factory in this country disaster will threaten every section of our country.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, in the discussion before the committee on yesterday I was led to the conclusion that this bill would not apply to any vessels to be hereafter bought by any American individual or corporation, but would apply only to vessels already owned by American corporations or individuals. Am I right in that?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It was designed particularly to allow the American registration of foreign-built ships now owned by American citizens or American corporations. As to the right to transfer American property from the British flag or other foreign flag to the American flag, I apprehend there will be no serious dispute. The bill goes further, because it refers to foreign-built ships hereafter acquired by American owners. In a given case respecting a ship hereafter purchased, or purchased while hostilities are on, the circumstances will determine whether the transfer should be recognized by the enemy of the belligerent.

A ship is always to be considered in two aspects: Its nationality is fixed by its flag; its ownership may be entirely different. That is to be attested by the ship's papers. Even to-day an American-owned ship flying a foreign flag is nothing more than property owned by an American citizen, and it is international law that, though the American is flying a foreign flag, he has the right to invoke the protection of his own Government against the aggressions of any other power.

With respect to the law question suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, it has been recognized in this country and in Great Britain that even in times of war the neutral may purchase a merchant ship from a belligerent and the transfer must be respected by the enemy, if the transaction is bona fide and honest. If it is a mere subterfuge, it will be disregarded. A more stringent rule has been recognized by the continental nations. In 1909, in a conference in London attended by all the nations of the earth, an effort was made to agree upon a uniform rule, and that rule I shall now read to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point just suggested by the Senator from New York is the point that has attracted my attention with regard to the proposed legislation. I am heartily in favor of the bill, but, in view of the circumstances, it ought to contain a provision that as to foreign-built ships bought by American citizens or by American corporations after the passage of the act and during the next yea. they should only be admitted to American registry upon the approval of the Secretary of State, who might inquire into the transaction, and by a little precaution of that kind avoid what might be a very unpleasant and unhappy international incident. I ask the Senator from New York whether, in his opinion, the bill ought not to contain a safeguard of that kind?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I see no objection to the insertion of such a provision.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. Before the Senator goes on with what he has in mind, I want to call to his attention the purposes of the Panama Canal act as it was originally passed and what is evidently intended by the amendment which is now pending. As I understand it, the Panama Canal act provided that ships of three kinds might be given American registry, and the first class was—vessels built within the United States and belonging wholly to citizens thereof.

Now, I want to ask the Senator if that would not permit the ships of the United Fruit Co., which are flying the British flag, to take an American registry at once, if that company desires to make the transfer, without any legislation whatever?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Having in mind that many of the ships of that company are foreign built——

Mr. WEEKS. They are not foreign built.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is the Senator sure as to that?

Mr. WEEKS. I know that very many of them were built in the United States; I do not know that all of them were, but many of them were. Now, what I am trying to get at is this: Have we not a law now which will provide for the transfer of these ships owned by American citizens without any further legislation?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Provided they are American-built vessels. As to such vessels we need no further legislation. This bill is designed, however, as has been stated, to give American registry to foreign-built ships.

Mr. SHIVELY. Under American ownership.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Under American ownership.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York submit to another question?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a principle of international law that any vessel purchased from a citizen of a belligerent country after hostilities have broken out, or within 30 days before they break out, is a suspect?

Mr. O'GORMAN. As I have stated, up until 1909, at the time of the London conference, and indeed down to to-day, the rule recognized in Great Britain and in the United States was and is that a neutral may buy a merchant vessel from a subject or citizen of a belligerent nation while hostilities are on, provided the transfer is legitimate and bona fide, and provided it is not conditioned, for instance, upon a return of the property at the close of the war under some agreement; but I was about to call attention to the fact—and probably it will answer the Senator's question—that in 1909 at the conference held in London there was a rule agreed upon which I shall read. I should say in passing that the conclusions of this conference were not ratified by the United States or by Great Britain, and therefore they are not binding on either, although in the judgment of many they express the best and latest thought on the subject of purchases by neutrals from belligerents in time of war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is not the Senator mistaken in saying that the conclusions of the conference were not agreed to by England? They were not agreed to by our own country, but, as I remember—I have not the papers before me now—they were agreed to by all other countries, with the exception of the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Government of England approved of the conclusions of the conference, but the House of Lords rejected them, and therefore they did not become binding upon England.

The section to which I invite your attention reads as follows:

The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

Under this rule, even if it were to be deemed applicable to this country and Great Britain, it would simply mean that the burden would be upon the owner of the vessel to overcome the presumption that the transfer was made in order to avoid the consequences to which an enemy vessel would be exposed.

There is a further proviso in connection with Rule 56 reading as follows:

There is an absolute presumption that a transfer is void (1) if the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockaded port; (2) if a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor; (3) if the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, has the Senator section 55 there?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator read section 55 in connection with section 56.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Section 55 is scarcely applicable at this time, although I will read it——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to that, I want to continue my inquiry. The fact is, then, that a vessel purchased after hostilities have begun and, as I recall, within 30 days before they have begun, from an enemy country and put under a neutral flag is a natural suspect?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the presumption of the validity of the transfer is against the vessel?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, I want to ask the Senator if he does not think this bill is likely to involve us in trouble if we permit such a vessel so purchased to be manned by officers who are citizens of the country from which the vessel is purchased? Section 2 provides:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

That is obviously intended to make it possible at the present time, for instance, for an American corporation to buy a German vessel, say, in the port of New York and to man her in whole or in part by German officers. If such a condition occurred, would it not naturally lead to complications, and possibly, by seizure, say from an English vessel, might it not involve us in serious difficulties with Great Britain?

It seems to me that this is not a proper time for this country to take any chances in permitting American vessels sailing under the American flag to be manned by any except American citizens, because if found manned or officered by citizens of one of the belligerent countries there would be a large presumption against the bona fides of the transfer and a strong suspicion that the transfer was questionable.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The rule as agreed upon by the London conference in 1909 with respect to the manning of a neutral ship by the natives of an enemy country would not prejudice the rights of the owner of the neutral ship. There would be no seizure; there would be no impressment. If, for instance, Germany were to seize a ship flying the American flag manned largely by a German crew and German officers, under the regulations of the London conference she could not remove the German crew and the German officers, but she could insist upon them signing a declaration that they would take no part in the pending war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to ask the Senator if he does not question the wisdom at this time of permitting American vessels to be officered by any other than American citizens? Is there such a scarcity of American officers and sailors that any vessels which may come under the American flag can not be officered and manned by them?

Mr. O'GORMAN. If there should be enough American officers to meet the emergency, it is not to be expected that foreigners would be employed; but if the accessions to the American merchant marine are as large as it is hoped they will be, it would be necessary, for a brief time at least, to employ foreigners for various positions on the ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he thinks it would be a square deal to permit foreign officers, who are being paid about one-half what American officers are paid, to sail these ships, and that we should waive the inspection and the measurements that our laws require and that this bill proposes that we shall waive? In other words, about the only thing on the ship that would be American would be the flag. Does the Senator think that would be fair to the ships that are now engaged in our foreign trade under all these requirements of our law?

Mr. O'GORMAN. If we were dealing with normal conditions in normal times, I would say, in answer to that question, no; but we are dealing with a great emergency. Our industries are being paralyzed. We have but six vessels flying the American flag on the Atlantic Ocean. What better suggestion comes from the Senator from New Hampshire in this emergency than the one that is proposed by this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would make one suggestion. I think if the Senator and his committee had turned their attention to an investigation as to whether or not there are vessels in our coastwise trade that could be put into the foreign trade, perhaps by a little change of our law, it would be a much more American procedure.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That can be done very readily.

Mr. STONE. Would that require any statutory authority?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would require a little change in the law, but a less change than is provided in this bill.

Mr. STONE. That could easily be done, if it is necessary to authorize vessels engaged in the coastwise trade to engage in the over-seas trade.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator from New York that there are a large number of coal and ore carrying vessels on the Great Lakes, of great capacity, which might be used for this purpose? I should think an immediate investigation should be made of that subject.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator think they are seagoing vessels?

Mr. WEEKS. I think they might be seagoing vessels in an emergency, capable of carrying grain and cotton.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that, according to an editorial in the New York World, there are a number of American merchant vessels engaged in the lake trade which are not only seagoing vessels, but vessels of such capacity that it would be impossible to get them through the Welland Canal.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no doubt an editorial from the New York World would have great influence with the Senator from New York.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not attempting to influence the Senator. I am simply making a suggestion to him, and I know the Senator will take a suggestion from any source.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The immediate question before the Senate is whether or not we shall have the merits of this bill now determined and passed upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator from New York, if he will permit me, that on yesterday I hurriedly wrote a resolution at my desk calling upon the Secretary of Commerce to make an immediate inquiry regarding the possibility of our transferring ships from the coastwise trade to the foreign trade. I do not know when a report will come. The resolution suggests that a report be made at as early a date as practicable. I think that is a matter that we ought to look into very carefully.

I am very much disturbed over the possibility of our purchasing some foreign tramp, perhaps 10 or 15 years old, about ready to go to the bottom anyway, registering it under the name of a corporation—perhaps a corporation newly created in New Jersey or some other State where they create corporations so freely—and calling it an American ship, officered by foreigners, our laws in regard to measurements and all that sort of thing being waived, the flag flying at the masthead, and that being about the only American thing about it. I think it would be in great danger of seizure on the high seas under this plan.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am in thorough accord with the effort of the Senator from New York and his committee to pass such a bill as this; and I think any fears on the part of some of the other Senators in regard to our getting into difficulties with foreign nations in the event that we pass the bill may be avoided by the provisions which may be inserted in it.

I have been very much interested in this matter, and prepared a bill on the subject several days ago, which I introduced day before yesterday, before this bill came from the House. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York and the other Senators who have been speaking on this subject to one or two of the provisions of that bill which I think will avoid any objection that has been made up to this time.

In regard to the watch officers being citizens of foreign nations, in this bill which I introduced—and I do not claim that it is perfect at all—I provided that the naval officers of the United States, either active or retired, and men serving or employed in the Navy, may, upon application made by them to the Secretary of the Navy, be permitted to accept such temporary service on board vessels so purchased. It seems to me that would provide against any implication that we were simply transferring the boats temporarily to the American flag. I also provided in the bill which I drew that the Secretary of the Treasury, before he permitted any transfer or bill of sale of the vessel to be recorded, should ascertain that at least 90 per cent of the vessel was owned by citizens of America in good faith.

It seemed to me that those provisions would avoid any danger of our becoming involved with foreign nations, certainly as to the commanding officers and watch officers and as to the absolute ownership; and the certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I believe is the usual way, he having charge of the collectors, would be the proper way to provide for it, and it would certainly relieve us of any imputation of bad faith.

I desire to call the attention of the Senator to those provisions, which I do not think are included in the bill, but certainly they would be of much assistance in determining that the boat flying the American flag was not flying it as a pretense. I hope the Senator and his committee will take those suggestions into consideration. I have furnished him or will furnish him with a copy of the proposed act.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just for a question. Suppose the bill presented by the committee should be passed and a German vessel should be bought, with German watch officers, all of whom should be transferred with the vessel; I want to ask the Senator, in his opinion, to what country those officers and seamen would owe their military allegiance?

Mr. O'GORMAN. If they owe military allegiance they will not be available for service on an American ship.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the question for information. I assume that citizens of Germany owe military allegiance to that country, the same as citizens of America owe military allegiance here. Would not that military allegiance follow even although they were upon and in command of an American ship?

Mr. O'GORMAN. There is a declaration in the London conference of 1909, accepted by Germany, that in the case the Senator gives as an illustration the German Government would not take the German crew off the ship, provided each German on the ship would sign a declaration that he did not intend to participate in the war.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will change the query, then, to an English ship, officered and manned by men who owe their military allegiance to the English Government, the English Government never having confirmed or entered into the conclusions of that conference. Would it be quite safe to have the officers and men of a ship engaged in our commerce——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I believe the same rule would apply with respect to British officers that would apply to the others.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course the Senator is not unaware of the fact that the United States at one time had some trouble, and one of the moving causes of that trouble was substantially the same thing which I have indicated; and even the end of that trouble did not determine that question as between Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It was supposed to be determined, although it was not the subject of express determination, at the close of the War of 1812.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before I ask the question which I am about to ask the Senator from New York, I should like to ask that part of section 5 of the Panama Canal act referred to in this bill—the act having been approved August 24, 1912—may be printed in the RECORD. I refer to the part of it which I have marked, and which I will send to the desk.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let it be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As soon as I ask the question I will then ask the Secretary to be kind enough to read the act. Now, I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the language of the Panama Canal act, if he has it in his hand.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Section 5 provides, at the bottom of page 2 of the act—

That section 4132 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows—

Then it sets forth how that section would read if amended. The bill that the Senator has reported provides that section 5 of the Panama Canal act is amended by striking out the words "not more than 5 years old at the time they apply for registry," but it seems to me that section 4132 should be amended by striking out those words.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would follow as a necessary and inevitable conclusion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not quite so sure of the inevitableness of it as the Senator from New York is. However that may be, I will now ask the Secretary to read the act, from the top of page 3, if the Senator from New York will permit me to do it in his time.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If he prefers that I shall wait, I will wait. I ask the Secretary to read, commencing at the top of page 3.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4132. Vessels built within the United States and belonging wholly to citizens thereof; and vessels which may be captured in war by citizens of the United States and lawfully condemned as prize, or which may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States; and seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, not more than five years old at the time they apply for registry, wherever built, which are to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title. Foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade: Provided, That a foreign-built yacht, pleasure boat, or vessel not used or intended to be used for trade admitted to American registry pursuant to this section shall not be exempt from the collection of ad valorem duty provided in section 37 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes." That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction or repair of vessels built in the United States and all such materials necessary for the building or repair of their machinery and all articles necessary for their outfit and equipment may be imported into the United States free of duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided further, That such vessels so admitted under the provisions of this section may contract with the Postmaster General under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," so long as such vessels shall in all respects comply with the provisions and requirements of said act, etc.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think the rest of it is material.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is there any question from the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I asked the Senator whether he thought striking out from that act the words I referred to would amend section 4132 of the general Revised Statutes?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do think so, and for this reason: Section 5 of the Panama Canal act amended a section of the Revised Statutes, and now by this act we are further amending the Revised Statutes, because we are amending and qualifying the language of section 5 of the Panama act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It might be so, Mr. President; but inasmuch as section 4132 now stands as a statute of the United States, it seems to me the direct method, the unquestionable method, would be to amend the existing statute, and not to attempt to amend the act which amended the statute. I see no reason for approaching the question in a circuitous method or route.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question about section 2. I am asking the question in no spirit of hostility to the proposed legislation, but I ask it because the Senator undoubtedly has given consideration to these questions, which some of us have had no opportunity of considering.

Under section 2 would it be possible for the President so to suspend the provisions of law therein referred to that all of the officers and crew of a vessel purchased by a citizen of the United States and admitted to registry would be foreigners?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I think so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Including the captain of the vessel?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So that it would be possible, for example, for a citizen of the United States to purchase a French vessel, manned entirely by French officers and by a French crew, and to continue the vessel under the control and operation of those officers and crew.

The question I desire to ask the Senator is whether or not, in this situation of affairs, he sees any danger in our committing to a set of officers and crew, all foreigners, all citizens of one of the belligerent nations, the observance of our neutrality obligations?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Of course the Senator is taking a very extreme case, a case that is not likely to arise. It is almost inconceivable that there will be any ships flying the American flag without some American officers aboard. The change which is now proposed is largely similar to the one that took place in 1864, when, owing to the stress of the Civil War and the difficulty in securing seamen, a provision of law which had existed for many, many years before that time, respecting the necessity of having American or naturalized American officers and crew, was repealed; and it remained repealed until 1898, when the present law was enacted, requiring all the watch officers to be Americans, either by birth or by adoption. The causes which constituted the emergency in 1864 in a measure are present now. With the world involved in war, we can not apply at this time the same reasons and rules and standards that will be applied in normal times under normal circumstances.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. The Senator from New York, as I understand him, would see some danger in the concrete case that I have put; that is, if we should under the operation of this amended statute acquire a French vessel, for example, and bodily take over the entire complement of officers and crew and permit them to operate the vessel. Now, would not the Senator see a very grave danger in such a situation with reference to the observance of our neutrality obligations?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I might not perceive the danger. I would say it would be regrettable to have a ship flying the American flag without any American on board in a responsible position, but I do not think such a situation will arise. I am sufficiently hopeful that we will not be driven to such an extremity, and that such a condition may not exist.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that on previous occasions when it has been deemed desirable to American vessels sailing with the watch officers of other countries there was no such a condition of war as would create the dangers predicted now? I sympathize very strongly with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that we are likely to find ourselves embroiled in serious international disputes if we undertake to raise the American flag over a vessel purchased from a foreign owner and still manned by a foreign crew? It seems to me that that is a danger which is real, and that it ought to be very seriously considered now.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I fear the danger is exaggerated; but let us suppose a case where a ship is purchased from one of the belligerents by a neutral in time of war. Suppose the enemy of the belligerent seizes that ship notwithstanding the fact that there has been a change of flag. The burden then is upon the purchaser of the ship to satisfy a prize court in the jurisdiction of the belligerent that the ship was purchased in good faith and that the transaction was not for the purpose of escaping the consequences of the war. If the owner of the ship could sustain that proposition his ship would not be condemned. If he could not uphold it his ship would be condemned.

I do not see why in a case of that character the United States Government should be involved at all, because I think the attitude of our Government would be that an American citizen, assuming that he had been permitted to buy the ship of a belligerent while war is pending, takes the chance of having the ship seized, and then, in the second place, of not being able to satisfy a prize court that the purchase was not made for the purpose of evading the consequences of the war. As I said, I do not see how it is going to touch the Government at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from New York a short time ago accurately stated the rule of the international law, that the purchase of a vessel of one of the belligerent parties during hostilities would be scrutinized very closely, but that it was a perfectly legitimate transaction and would be upheld by the rules of international law if it were a bona fide purchase. There can be no doubt about that. But suppose all that; suppose it be a bona fide purchase so far as the citizen of the United States is concerned, but as in the case that I have already supposed, the French crew and the French officers are continued on board the vessel, which may be permitted to be done under this proposed amendment. The Senator will readily concede that the officers and crew of that vessel under such circumstances would owe no allegiance to the United States. Their allegiance would still be to the French Government. All their sympathies would be with the French Government. Suppose it turned out that the vessel so manned had rendered valuable service to the French Government in this war.

Mr. O'GORMAN. While flying the American flag?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; while flying the American flag, by landing contraband articles or in any other case that we might readily suppose. Suppose that were done, would not Germany and Austria have a real cause to complain against the United States for permitting that sort of a condition to exist?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes; if the United States did permit it or was cognizant of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How would the United States prevent it?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would be controlled by an entirely different proposition of law, which defines what is contraband and what is not, and indicates the duties resting upon a neutral government. The neutral government is not to be held responsible for an expedition of one of its vessels in contraband trade unless the neutral government either knew or had reason to suspect that its citizens were so engaged.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, the things I am supposing or apprehending might be done would be done in spite of any instructions from our Government or any laws we might have on the subject, and when done the mischief would be done. Anything that we might do afterwards in the way of punishment, if we could inflict any, would not alter the fact that the mischief had already happened. Under those circumstances is there not a real danger that we may be involved in complications with the other belligerent powers if we should take over the ships of France or England and continue their officers and crew in the service of the ships?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is all on the assumption that there would be no American on board exercising a responsible authority.

Mr. GALLINGER. There need not be under the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The bill gives the President the power to do all the things that go to the extreme length I have suggested. The whole question, to my mind, is whether that ought not to be safeguarded.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The discretion under the bill is confided to the President, and it is a question whether under the stress of these conditions we should hesitate to deposit with the President this power, having confidence in his wise exercise of it.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. We are now, Mr. President, in the greatest crisis known in the world's history since the fall of Rome. Our country is the great neutral power. What the future will be it is impossible for any of us to predict. We know this fact, however, that to-day the United States of America is the great neutral power in the world. I should hope that we might play a very important part in the future, a part becoming this great Republic.

Now, that being the situation, I simply want to ask the Senator from New York this question, whether to-day we should pass any legislation which might by any possibility be construed by the great powers of Europe as a violation of the strictest neutrality of this country? What we may possibly decide to do later when matters are more settled presents a different question.

It appears from this discussion that this bill raises a disputed question of international law, and I for one will not at this time vote for any legislation which might lead to a possible violation of international law and thus involve us with the great warring powers of Europe. Out of abundant caution, therefore, and in view of the magnitude of the interests involved, I would ask the Senator from New York whether he thinks it wise at this time, and without further consideration, to pass this legislation?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, no Senator can read this bill and entertain the opinion or impression that it contravenes any treaty obligation. Of course, there is a possibility that some citizens of this country, acting under its provisions, may invite the criticism of one of the belligerents, and may go so far as to suffer the loss of a ship, unless the American owner is prepared at all times to demonstrate that the action was a legitimate and bona fide one, and not designed to evade the consequences of the war.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The practice of taking prizes and throwing them into the court of the nation that has been guilty of making the capture is a relic of piracy. It is, I think, admitted as being one of the relics of piracy that we have not gotten rid of. Are we not unnecessarily exposing the property of Americans who have purchased ships in good faith to a situation where, as was the case in the days of the French spoliations, they will take these ships in this great war into their own ports and condemn them and sell the property? The situation that we are creating by this law presents just such a condition as would give a color of right under the old piratical practice of taking prizes and to have the little shipping we have spoliated and destroyed. It was destroyed 100 years ago by France and England, and we to-day have claims pending here, and have had for 100 years, growing out of that situation. It seems to me that we are taking a snap shot which may expose us to a repetition of the same losses as those if we are going to allow the captain and all the watches of the vessel and everybody in command of the vessel to be loyal to another Government and simply depend upon a bill of sale to establish bona fide ownership.

I remember very well in examining a great many of the cases in connection with the French spoliations the destruction of the ship's papers and how the ship's crew were treated in a very lawless way for the purpose of condemning the prize and appropriating the proceeds.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I think we are borrowing a great deal of trouble about this matter in anticipating things that the present situation does not present.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] seems to be troubled with some fear that if our citizens should buy a foreign ship and the President should take advantage of this act and suspend the requirement that the watch officers should be American citizens we might be involved in some international trouble. I do not think there is any ground for apprehension about that matter. The character of a ship is not determined at all by the nationality of her crew. The character of a ship is determined by her ownership and by her registry.

I apprehend that if we had deemed it wise to permit American owners of American ships to employ their crews from many of the nations of the earth, and if we had such a law as that now, no nation could be heard to find fault with it. That would give us perfect liberty to hire crews of any nation, and the character of the ship would not be determined by the nationality, for instance, of the captain or the mate or any other officer, or even by the men before the mast.

So, Mr. President, that question is practically out of the matter.

Likewise some suggestion is made that we will get into difficulty if we abolish the provision of the existing law by which foreign ships are denied registry unless they are less than 5 years old. The present act permits an American to buy a foreign ship if she is not 5 years old and to give her American registry. If the purchase of a ship from foreign owners at the present time is likely to get us into trouble, we are in the same trouble under the law as it stands that we would be in under the law as amended; in other words, we would be involved in the same trouble if we bought a ship less than 5 years old. We are simply authorizing the purchase of ships more than 5 years old.

But, Mr. President, there is not any ground for apprehension upon that score.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WALSH. Gladly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Under the second clause we are suspending the law with reference to the watches. The captain may be a foreigner and all the men in charge of the watches may be foreigners.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The prize court law does not seem to be so well settled as the Senator would assume. Suppose one of these vessels flying the American flag, manned entirely by foreigners, was destined to a port of one of the belligerent nations and was loaded with a cargo that might under some rules be regarded as contraband and she was taken into port and condemned as a prize, are we not furnishing the evidence by throwing down the bars here to sustain her condemnation in a court in the port of a belligerent?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator in the question he propounded to me is assuming a whole lot of conditions quite separate and apart from the question here. He wants me to assume the case of a ship purchased under circumstances which themselves give rise to suspicion. He wants me to assume the case of a ship that is loaded with goods which may be regarded as contraband. He wants me to assume a whole lot of things. Of course, no matter what the conditions are if the ship is loaded with contraband, she is liable to confiscation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. My point is that when we permit the vessel to fly our flag and to be manned entirely by foreigners we are adding color to the case which could be made against us in a prize court.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question. Suppose we did not have any such law as this and suppose our laws permitted all our ships to be manned by officers of any nationality——

Mr. CRAWFORD. But——

Mr. WALSH. Would we be running any more risk than we are?

Mr. CRAWFORD. But that is not quite a case that this bill will cover. If we retain the provision that the vessel must be officered by Americans, then, assuming that the purchase is in good faith, I think she would be much less likely to be condemned as a prize than if she were found entirely in charge of a foreign crew and officers, including the captain.

Mr. WALSH. Of course that presents a legal proposition as to whether the nationality of the crew determines the nationality of the ship. There is no rule to that effect.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no rule to that effect, but neither is there a uniform, well-established rule governing prize courts in the matter, as I have read such rules.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I believe unanimous consent has not as yet been given, has it, for the consideration of this bill? I have some observations to make on the bill, but I do not care to make them unless the bill is under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New York a question before unanimous consent is granted for the consideration of the bill. I desire to ask him whether there has been an indication from any source of any desire on the part of anyone or of any company to place ships under our flag in case such legislation as this is enacted?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes; I know of ships that are foreign-built which, I am told, will fly the American flag if this bill is passed.

Mr. JONES. Has there been any proposition made to the Government of that kind?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send an amendment to the desk which I desire to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 1, to strike out lines 8, 9, and 10, and, on page 2, to strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, and to insert the following:

That section 4132 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, is hereby amended by striking out the words "not more than 5 years old at the time they apply for American registry," so that said section as so amended will read as follows:

"Vessels built within the United States and belonging wholly to citizens thereof; and vessels which may be captured in war by citizens of the United States and lawfully condemned as prize, or which may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States; and seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, wherever built, which are to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the President and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title. Foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade: Provided, That a foreign-built yacht, pleasure boat, or vessel not used or intended to be used for trade admitted to American registry pursuant to this section shall not be exempt from the collection of ad valorem duty provided in section 37 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.' That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction or repair of vessels built in the United States and all such materials necessary for the building or repair of their machinery and all articles necessary for their outfit and equipment may be imported into the United States free of duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided further, That such vessels so admitted under the provisions of this section may contract with the Postmaster General under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' so long as such vessels shall in all respects comply with the provisions and requirements of said act."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a question——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask my friend from New Hampshire to yield to me until I can propose an amendment and have it pending.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield with pleasure to the Senator from Arkansas for that purpose.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by striking out, beginning with the word "whenever," on line 5, page 2, down to and including the word "desirable," on line 7, page, 2, and to insert:

He shall find that the available supply of persons qualified under existing laws and regulations of the United States to fill the respective positions of watch officers on vessels admitted to registry by this act he shall suspend by order so far and for such time as he may find to be necessary.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The purpose of the amendment I have offered and which has just been read is to cure an obvious defect in that section, and when we reach it for consideration I wish to have a few words to say about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. In order that it may be pending before the Senate I propose the amendment which I send to the desk, to follow line 16, on page 2. I desire that the amendment shall be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 16, on page 2, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That as to all foreign-built ships purchased by our citizens or corporations during the next year the application for United States registry must be approved by the Secretary of State before the registry is granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the amendments which have been offered, and which, of course, can not be given proper consideration simply from hearing them read, it occurs to me that it would be well to let this bill go over until to-morrow and have the amendments printed, so that we may have the entire subject before us; but if that is not acceded to, I want to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Owing to the disposition made of the time for this legislative day, I am inclined to agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. And will the Senator from New York ask unanimous consent that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow the bill be brought up?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I make that request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before the bill is laid aside, I desire to offer a proposed amendment, to be inserted at the proper place in the bill, and have it pending.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall not, of course, under our rules have a right to claim the floor to-morrow morning, but I shall then ask a little time to discuss the merits of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will do the very best he can to see the Senator from New Hampshire to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Chair. Let the amendment sent to the desk be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment has already been printed, as of date August 3, calendar day August 4, and is to insert in the proper place the following:

And the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of domestic trade require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law confining the trade from points on the Atlantic coast to points on the Pacific coast and from points on the Pacific coast to points on the Atlantic coast to American ships.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer and have pending another amendment to be known as section 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has already been printed.

Mr. JONES. I know that it has been printed, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it, so that it may be considered to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 3 the following:

SEC. 3. From and after 30 days from the signing of a treaty closing the war now existing in Europe all goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels not admitted to registration under the laws of the United States shall be subject to a duty of 10 per cent in excess of the duties imposed by the act of October 3, 1913, and all goods so imported which are admitted free under said act shall pay a duty of 5 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That the foregoing provisions shall not go into effect as to goods imported in the vessels of those nations with which we have treaties which said provisions contravene until said treaties have been duly abrogated, and the President is hereby directed to abrogate any treaties which would interfere with the taking effect of said provisions in the manner provided by said treaties and without delay.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer an amendment to come in as three new sections.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, lest I forget it, I now request that the bill be reprinted with the proposed amendments in brackets or italics, so that we may have them before us precisely as it is intended to amend the bill, if the amendments are agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be reprinted with the proposed amendments in brackets.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will suspend my inquiry until after the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has had the amendment which he proposes read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware desire his amendment read?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should prefer to have it read; yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add three new sections to the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury, on being satisfied that not less than 90 per cent of the capital invested in any foreign-built steamship is the bona fide property of citizens, whether individuals or corporations, shall direct the bills of sale or transfer of the foreign-built steamships so acquired to be recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the proper collection district and cause such steamships to be registered as vessels of the United States by said collector, after which each of such vessels shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a vessel of the United States, except that it shall not be employed in the coastwise trade of the United States unless the voyage in which such vessel may be engaged requires its passage through the Panama Canal.

SEC. 4. That no sale or transfer of any steamship, or of any share or interest therein, or of any shares of capital stock of any corporation owning the same, granted registry under the terms of this act, shall be valid or of any force or effect, or anywhere be admitted as evidence of the sale or transfer thereof, or anywhere recorded, unless the same shall be first consented to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and no sale or transfer even when valid and properly recorded shall relieve any vendee or transferee thereof from the conditional holding under this act; and at any time and from time to time after such grant of registry as herein provided, any steamships so registered may be taken by the United States as provided in section 4 of an act entitled "An act to encourage American shipbuilding," approved May 10, 1892, and used for any purpose for which other vessels of the United States may be lawfully used.

SEC. 5. That naval officers of the United States, active or retired, and men serving or employed in the Navy of the United States may, upon application made by them to the Secretary of the Navy, be permitted to accept such temporary service on board vessels registered under the terms of this act as may not be detrimental to the naval efficiency of the United States, without prejudice to their rank or status in the naval service, or any loss, prejudice, or detriment whatever, excepting only that while engaged on board such vessels the officers and men so engaged shall receive only such pay and compensation as they agree upon with the owners of such vessel.

Mr. BRYAN. I inquire if the bill in charge of the Senator from New York has been laid aside?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, by unanimous consent, the bill goes over until after the morning business to-morrow.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have been requested by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of War to read and to ask the attention of the Senate to the following memorandum:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR,
August 5.

[Memorandum.]

Private individuals or firms desiring to ship gold to Europe for the relief of distress can do so by delivering the same either to Col. A. L. Smith or Maj. J. A. Logan at the U. S. S. Tennessee, at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Specific directions as to the desired disposition of this gold must accompany the deposits. Receipts will be given. Custody will be taken and an earnest effort made to deliver according to directions. If delivery proves impossible the gold will be returned.

No fund will be received in any other medium than gold.

One of the before-named officers is now on the U. S. S. Tennessee to receive deposits. Deposits will be received up to the time of the sailing of the vessel, which is not yet definitely determined, but it will be probably late to-night (Wednesday) or to-morrow (Thursday).

I will say, Mr. President, that there is going to be considerable gold shipped by this vessel, the U. S. S. Tennessee, and it is desired to give publicity to the fact that such shipments can be made on that vessel.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANK FUNDS.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I am willing that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee shall be adopted.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment reported by the committee, on page 1, line 9, after the word "exceed," it is proposed to strike out "$2,000" and to insert "$1,000," and on page 2, line 2, after the words "excess of," to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That such part of section 6 of the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a system of postal saving depositories, as reads "but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month" is hereby amended to read as follows: "but the balance to the credit of any person, exclusive of accumulated interest, shall not exceed $1,000," and said act is further amended so as to repeal the proviso in section 7 thereof and insert in lieu of such proviso the following: "Provided, That no interest shall be paid on such part of the balance to the credit of any person as is in excess of $500."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none——

Mr. JONES. I do not want the amendment to the amendment to be carried by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to be known as section 2. I do not know that it is necessary to have the Secretary read it, as it has been printed and is on the desks of Senators. I desire, after line 3, on page 2, to insert the matter indicated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state the substance of it?

Mr. BRYAN. The amendment simply embodies section 9 of the postal savings act of 1910, with an amendment providing that the deposits of the postal savings funds may be placed in banks that are not member banks.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, after line 3, insert:

"SEC. 2. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in solvent banks, whether organized under national or State laws, and whether member banks or not of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, being subject to national or State supervision and examination, and the sums deposited shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and Territories thereof; but 5 per cent of such funds shall be withdrawn by the board of trustees and kept with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be treasurer of the board of trustees, in lawful money as a reserve. The board of trustees shall take from such banks such security in public bonds or other securities, supported by the taxing power, as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt payment of such deposits on demand. The funds received at the postal savings depository offices in each city, town, village, and other locality shall be deposited in banks located therein (substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of each such bank) willing to receive such deposits under the terms of this act and the regulations made by authority thereof, but the amount deposited in any one bank shall at no time exceed the amount of the paid-in capital and one-half the surplus of such bank. If no such bank exist in any city, town, village, or locality, or if none where such deposits are made will receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then such funds shall be deposited under the terms of this act in the bank most convenient to such locality. If no such bank in any State or Territory is willing to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then the same shall be deposited with the treasurer of the board of trustees and shall be counted in making up the reserve of 5 per cent. Such funds may be withdrawn from the treasurer of said board of trustees, and all other postal savings funds, or any part of such funds, may be at any time withdrawn from banks and savings depository offices for the repayment of postal savings depositors when required for that purpose. When, in the judgment of the President, war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires, the board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in bonds or other securities of the United States. The board of trustees may, in its discretion, purchase from the holders thereof bonds which have been or may be issued under the provisions of section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910. Interest and profit accruing from the deposits or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue: Provided, That postal savings funds in the treasury of said board shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act, and not otherwise: Provided further, That the board of trustees may at any time dispose of bonds held as postal savings investments and use the proceeds to meet withdrawals of deposits by depositors. For the purposes of this act the word 'Territory,' as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the District of Alaska, and Porto Rico, and the word 'bank' shall be held to include savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, before the bill is put on its passage I wish to say that, in my judgment, it is greatly improved by the amendments which have been offered. I offered some opposition to the legislation when it was before the Senate early in the summer, but I am not going to continue that opposition, on account of the improvement which has been made in the bill as amended. I do not think that even now, however, it is wise legislation or conforms to the original purpose of the postal savings-bank law.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I should like to have the question put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but the Chair does not know for what purpose Senators are standing on their feet.

Mr. OWEN. I understood that the bill had been disposed of under the announcement of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been. The question has not been put on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I simply wanted the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to withhold the introduction of any further matter until the Chair has had an opportunity to put the question. I am not complaining of the action of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to recognize Senators when they rise and address the Chair. The Chair can not tell whether they want to talk about the bill or whether they want something else done.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I rather think this legislation is injudicious, but in view of the amendments that have been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts I shall interpose no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT RICHMOND, VA.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It is a very urgent matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11822) to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say that the Senate passed a bill appropriating $600,000 for this purpose. The House passed a similar bill appropriating $450,000. I simply desire to pass the House bill exactly as it was passed by the House. It is a very urgent matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this the Senate bill?

Mr. SWANSON. It is not the Senate bill; it is the House bill. I desire to pass the House bill, and then the Senate bill will die.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chair lays this bill before the Senate under our rules, I suppose.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. What I was going to ask was whether the bill has been laid by the Chair before the Senate and referred to the committee?

Mr. SWANSON. It has been.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been handed down and has been referred to the committee. This is a report from the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I ask.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, the remainder of the block, bounded by Main, Tenth, Eleventh, and Bank Streets, in which the post office, courthouse, and customhouse, in the city of Richmond, Commonwealth of Virginia, is located, at a cost not exceeding $450,000, provided that in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the public interest would be better served by acquiring said property than by acquiring another site for additional post-office facilities.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. I understood, although there was some confusion, that this bill is exactly the same as the bill that has passed the Senate, with the exception as to amount.

Mr. SWANSON. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And the Senate bill is now pending in the House?

Mr. SWANSON. It is pending in the House. The House passed this bill with some amendments. I notice that some slight amendments were made to the House bill. It leaves the authorities discretion to buy other sites if they deem it advisable.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The House took no notice, then, of the Senate bill that was sent to them?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Did the House take notice of the Senate bill?

Mr. SWANSON. It was referred to the committee. The two bills were introduced simultaneously; but I notice that th's bill includes some matters that were not included in the Senate bill, giving the authorities discretion to purchase a site elsewhere if it is found advisable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSITS OF STATE BANKS AND TRUST COMPANIES.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4966, which proposes an amendment to the Federal reserve act relating to the reserves held by the State banks, and permitting them during the period of 36 months within which the system is being put in force to hold reserves now held by them for other State banks and have them counted as if they were held by national banks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NELSON. Let the title of the bill be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4966) proposing an amendment as to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the bill may be again read. I am not familiar with its provisions.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 19, subsections (b) and (c) of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"(b) A bank in a reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, shall hold and maintain reserves equal to 15 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 5 per cent of its time deposits, as follows:

"In its vaults for a period of 36 months after said date, six-fifteenths thereof, and permanently thereafter five-fifteenths.

"In the Federal reserve bank of its district for a period of 12 months after the date aforesaid, at least three-fifteenths, and for each succeeding 6 months an additional one-fifteenth, until six-fifteenths have been so deposited, which shall be the amount permanently required.

"For a period of 36 months after said date the balance of the reserves may be held in its own vaults, or in the Federal reserve bank, or in national banks in central reserve cities, as now defined by law.

"After said 36 months' period all of said reserves, except those hereinbefore required to be held permanently in the vaults of the member bank and in the Federal reserve bank, shall be held in its vaults or in the Federal reserve bank or in both, at the option of the member bank.

"(c) A bank in a central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, shall hold and maintain a reserve equal to 18 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 5 per cent of its time deposits, as follows:

"In its vaults, six-eighteenths thereof.

"In the Federal reserve bank, seven-eighteenths.

"The balance of said reserves shall be held in its own vaults or in the Federal reserve bank, at its option.

"Any Federal reserve bank may receive from the member banks as reserves not exceeding one-half of each installment, eligible paper as described in section 13 properly indorsed and acceptable to the said reserve bank.
